Of rubies we have several: Betelguese in the constellation of Orion, Antares in Scorpio, and the precious old Mars. Betelguese is opposite the opalescent first-magnitude star Rigel, and they both may be seen a little higher in the sky and a trifle farther west than Sirius. Scorpio with its splendid ruby Antares, the reddest star in our vision, may be seen only by those who rise early in the morning, before the sun has peeked above the horizon, when Antares may be seen shining brilliantly in the eastern sky, low down and approaching the south. Mars, our old familiar semi-annual visitor, shines early in the evening, very high in the heavens, and still farther west than Orion.

Rigel is an opal, a pale blue star that sparkles so gorgeously in the parallelogram of Orion, diagonally opposite Betelguese, and aptly illustrates the infinitude of space. We are told that although modern science has equipped the astronomers with instruments capable of accurately measuring distances so immense that there is no difficulty in stating that the North Star is 306,623,132,000,000 of miles from the earth, still, notwithstanding all their facility, the beautiful Rigel shines clearly and steadily above us too far off in the infinite realms of space for the distance to be measured. Think of a railroad train traveling at the speed of a mile a minute, and journeying on and on for 500,000,000 years, and you have some idea of known distances, for your train has but taken you to the North Star. Yet Rigel lies beyond!

Very near the planet Mars during these prevernal evenings another dull red star of first magnitude is seen, the beautiful Aldebaran, in the constellation of Taurus; and almost overhead, perhaps a little west of the zenith, is still another star of the first quality, the magnificent Capella; a nugget of pure gold is Capella, a ray of light from whose polished surface requires thirty years to reach the earth. In other words, if its light were suddenly to be extinguished, we should not know the difference for thirty years. The ancients named Capella "the star of stars," because when it and a new moon sank together in the west their new year was begun.

And so through all the heavens these bright jewels are fixed. The mind of man is filled with amazement when he considers how marvelously they illustrate the wondrous order of a wise Creator; how through all the ages they have not varied; that tonight the glorious "star of stars" shines as surely in its place as it shone two thousand years ago, while all these suns of another realm have risen in the east and set in the west with the same perfect rhythm with which the monarch of our own solar system has spread its warm rays upon us since time began.

W. J. LOCKWOOD.

NOT FOR LONG

A SUMMER'S day,
A robin's song,
A tuneful lay—
But not for long!
The black of night
Must come again;
The bright sunlight
Will turn to rain.
But miss not, heart, the lovely song,
Because it will not be for long.

A lonely life,
A broken heart,
A world of strife
Where friends must part.
But dawn at last
Must follow night—
The darkness past,
Comes morning's light.
Then weep not, heart, for seeming wrong,
Because it will not be for long.

During the year 1911 this company received through the mails from Christian Herald Readers alone—over

$78,000.00

This is significant for two reasons:

It shows the confidence CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have in the advertisements appearing in this paper—

And it shows also the appreciation they have for a Savings investment that is thoroughly sound and conservative and at the same time liberal in interest returns—

The Calvert Mortgage & Deposit Company has been in business seventeen years.

It accepts deposits of money in amounts from $25 to $5,000. Pays interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per year for every day the money is in its care and allows withdrawals at any time without notice.

It is a significant fact that in the entire history of the company there never has been a single day's delay in the payment of interest, or the repayment of principal when due or demanded.

Money entrusted to this company is invested only in high grade mortgages or improved real estate. These mortgages are deposited in trust with one of the strongest trust companies in Baltimore for the protection of investors.

This gives to investors as nearly absolute security as it is possible for human integrity to devise.

Let us send you the new 5 per cent book telling in detail about this most conservative and profitable form of investment

AMORTIZATION

AMORTIZATION is a word found in but few dictionaries, and those of recent issue, but it is coming into use "to supply a long-felt want." Once introduced to this word, however, we wonder how we managed to write on finance and live up to the year of grace 1912 without it. Amortization means the practice of distributing over a series of periods burdens which might otherwise fall on one period. Mr. Herbert W. Briggs, editor of The Rollins Magazine, has given the word a publicity that must result in a wide popularity as soon as the meaning of the term has had time to seep in. We shall not attempt to paraphrase Mr. Briggs's excellent article, as the reader will get a better idea of the subject if we quote it in full:

"A sinking fund is a regular periodic appropriation toward the liquidation of a future obligation. For example, a corporation has a bond issue of $1,000,000 maturing in forty years. If 2 per cent. of this issue, or $20,000, is devoted each year to the retirement of the bonds, four-fifths of the entire issue will have been redeemed at maturity, leaving only $200,000 of the original debt to be paid. There are many different methods of determining the amount to be set aside for sinking fund purposes, but no matter what the method of operation, the principle is the same, each year is made to bear a small burden in order to decrease the amount of the debt at maturity; and this is amortization.

Gradual Payments

"Another common form of amortization as applied to the payment of an issue of bonds, is to issue them serially. For example, a million dollar issue, instead of being due in forty years, may be payable $25,000 each year, with the result that at maturity the entire debt will have been paid without any single payment of more than $25,000. This of course coincides very closely with our definition of amortization.

"Depreciation and reserve funds, which are set aside out of earnings, either formally or informally, by nearly all railroads and public service companies, are another form of amortization. Corporation bonds are nearly all secured by mortgage on physical property. If this property is allowed to depreciate, the security back of the bond is diminished to that extent. Physical property, for the most part, depreciates or deteriorates in value with use. Whatever is allowed to become worthless will probably have to be replaced. Without a depreciation or a reserve fund, the cost of replacement would fall with undue weight at some one time, but a depreciation fund serves to distribute replacement expense, so that it practically becomes an annual charge instead of an unprovided-for emergency.

Bond Premiums

"One of the most common forms of amortization is met every time you buy a bond at a premium. The bond value tables that show you the true income basis of a bond recognize the principle of amortization. To illustrate this point, let us suppose that you purchase a ten-year 6 per cent. $1,000 bond, at a price of 110.00. You have invested $1,100. You will receive interest of $60 a year. When the bond matures, however, it will be paid at par, or $1,000. You have lost $100 somewhere during the transaction. The bond value tables, however, show that a 6 per cent. bond at 110.00, due in ten years, really yields only 4.73 per cent. In other words, $47.30 of the $60 that you receive is income; $12.70 is principal. If you spend the entire income of $60, you are spending some of your capital. If, however, you spend only $47.30 of it, and save and invest $12.70, you are thereby amortizing the $100 premium, the loss of which would otherwise come home to you with full force at the maturity of the bond.

"Practical every-day illustrations of amortization are legion. Every insurance policy is a form of amortization. When you pay $10 a year to insure your house for $1,000 against loss by fire, you are assuming a small annual burden to protect yourself against a possible loss of $1,000 at some one time. When you buy a piano on the instalment plan and pay $5 or $10 a month, you are amortizing the cost of the piano by distributing the expense over sundry periods instead of paying the bill in one lump sum. Building Loan Associations and Co-operative Banks conduct their business on the principle of amortization. When you borrow money from them to build a house they require you to repay them from time to time not only the interest on the money but a small amount towards the principal, so that before the debt is due you have entirely wiped out or amortized it.

Dividends Not Income

"Fortunes are lost in dividend-paying mining securities by those who do not realize that a mine must sooner or later become exhausted, and that when it does, its shares will be without value. The attractive dividends are looked upon as income, whereas they really are partly income and partly the return payment of invested principal against the day when the stock represents merely the ownership of an exhausted mine.

"Economists tell us that as a nation we are spending principal as well as income by exhausting instead of conserving our natural resources, and that we are consequently not as wealthy a nation as we appear to be. The plea for conservation of our mines and forests and other natural resources is based on the sound thought that we have no right to ask posterity to bear the burden of want that would be unnecessary if we moderated our annual expenditures of natural capital. Even scientific forestry and the rotation of crops are forms of amortization, in that they call for present agricultural economy as insurance against the denudation of the forest and the impoverishment of the soil.

A Useful Lesson

"Amortization has a direct individual lesson for almost everybody. Thousands of men save nothing between twenty and sixty and are then confronted with the fact that their earning capacity is impaired or has perhaps vanished. To them comes the realization of the fact that they have been spending, not only the income that represented their earning capacity, but their principal of health, strength, youth, ability and courage. The habit of thrift is an amortization of old age. The setting aside of a little money each year is a periodic burden, but one which, when assumed and religiously borne, takes the sting away from the impaired earning capacity that old age may bring. If a man who, between twenty and sixty, has an average earning capacity of $2,000 a year, has saved $40,000 by the time he is sixty, his savings invested at 5 per cent. will produce him an income of $2,000 a year. This sum would be accumulated if during the years of his earning power he saved a dollar a day, and invested it as it accumulated at 5 per cent.

"All amortization funds that are invested must necessarily be invested safely or they will not produce the desired results, for it may eventuate that the small burdens have been assumed during the many periods only to have the larger burden finally present itself with full weight. Saving is amortization and the best and most practical form of amortization that has ever been discovered, but savings must be invested with safety in order that the fruits of self-denial may be fully realized."

It Took 25 Years to Build It

By R. E. Olds, Designer

I have spent 25 years in building automobiles. Reo the Fifth is my 24th model.

I have watched every improvement, all the world over, from the very start of this industry.

I have had actual experience with tens of thousands of cars, under every condition that motorists meet.

All I have learned in those 25 years is embodied in this car. And I know of no other engineer in the business who builds cars as I build this.

My Precautions

What I mean is this:

The need for infinite care, for utter exactness, for big margins of safety is taught by experience only.

Countless things which theory approves are by use proved insufficient.

Splendid cars fall down on little points. The maker corrects them. Then something else shows unexpected shortcomings.

Perfection is reached only through endless improvements. It comes only with years of experience. Were I buying a car I would want it built by the oldest man in the business.

For Example

All the steel I use is analyzed, so I know its exact alloy.

The gears are tested in a crushing machine with 50 tons' capacity. Thus I know to exactness what each gear will stand. I used to test them, as others do, with a hammer.

I use Nickel Steel for the axles and driving shaft, and make them much larger than necessary. These parts can't be too strong.

I use Vanadium Steel for connections.

One after another I have cut out ball bearings, because they don't stand the test. I use roller bearings—Timken and Hyatt High Duty. There are only three ball bearings in this whole car, and two are in the fan.

I test my magneto under tremendous compression, and for ten hours at a time. My carburetor is doubly heated—with hot air and hot water. Half the troubles come from low grade gasoline, and this double heating avoids them.

I insist on utter exactness, a thousand inspections, tests of every part. As a result, errors don't develop when the car gets on the road.

Costly Care

I give to the body the same care as the chassis, for men like impressive cars.

The body is finished in 17 coats. The upholstering is deep. It is made of genuine leather and filled with hair.

The lamps are enameled. Even the engine is nickel trimmed. I finish each car like a show car.

The wheels are large, the car is over-tired. The wheel base is long, the tonneau is roomy, there is plenty of room for the driver's feet.

All the petty economies, which are so common, are avoided in Reo the Fifth.

My Level Best

This car embodies the best I know. It is built, above all, to justify men's faith in my designing.

Not one detail has been stinted. Not one could be improved by me if the car was to sell for $2,000.

Reo the Fifth marks my limit. I will yield my place as the dean of designers to a man who can build a car better.

Center Control No Side Levers

In this car I bring out my new center control. All the gear shifting is done by moving this handle less than three inches in each of four directions.

There are no side levers, so the entrance in front is clear. Both brakes are operated by foot pedals, one of which also operates the clutch.

This fact permits of the left side drive. The driver may sit, as he should sit, close to the cars he passes—on the up side of the road. This was formerly possible in electric cars only.

The Little Price

The initial price on this car has been fixed at $1,055. But our contracts with dealers provide for instant advance.

This price, in the long run, I regard as impossible. It is based on maximum output, on minimum cost for materials.

We have a model factory, splendidly equipped. Our output is enormous. We have spent many years in cutting cost of production. And this year we save about 20 per cent by building only one chassis in this great plant.

We can undersell others, and always will. But the present price is too low under average conditions. I am sure it must be advanced, and those who delay must expect it.

This car will never be skimped, while I build it, to keep within an altruistic price.

You Can See It In a Thousand Towns

We have dealers in a thousand towns. When you write us for catalog we will tell you the nearest.

Write today for this book. It pictures the various up-to-date bodies, and shows all the interesting facts. The Roadster type sells for $1,000.

Never was a car in all my experience made so welcome as Reo the Fifth. Men miss a treat who fail to see this car. Address

GOOD FOLLOWERS BECOMING GOOD LEADERS*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE apostles were first good followers of Jesus, and so became good leaders of others. That is the great truth in this lesson, that they showed themselves good followers first. Some of us are not fitted to be leaders, and it is the wisest and happiest way to remember, cheerily, that

> Some must follow, and some must lead,
> Though all be made of clay.

It is better to be a good follower than a bad leader. It is a great thing to choose for yourself a worthy leader, and follow faithfully, with no touch of envy—with that loving loyalty that is symbolized when subjects of a good and great king kiss his hand, because his leadership is not selfish but a public service of his people.

Let us not linger so long over the interesting history of the apostles that we shall not have time to learn just how each one of us may become "one to help Jesus" to-day. The most instructive things about the apostles are: They were all Galilean working people, except Judas of Judea. They were by no means perfect. They tell us frankly how ambitious and dull-hearted they were up to the day of Pentecost. They started in Christian life with no great excitement by simply obeying the "follow me" of Jesus. That made them disciples—learners in the school of Jesus. Afterward, in the second year of Christ's ministry, he selected out of many disciples the twelve most faithful and the most spiritual to be with him daily that they might be fitted to lead the world In His Name when he should go back to heaven. Twelve signified that Jesus would establish a new spiritual Israel, a new Holy Land. It was not a mere honor that Jesus put on these men, for leadership meant the cross not only to Jesus but to Peter and Andrew also, and it meant martyrdom to most of the others. Theirs was the ecstasy of self-sacrifice for the good of others, of which we have an illustration in the story of General White, who was in England when his regiment was sent to the front, and he requested that he might be permitted to go with them. The prime minister, however, was anxious to have his presence and advice in the perplexing situation, and he begged him to remain in London. General White's reply was, "Suppose my regiment should be cut to pieces, and I not with them!"

Here is the list of apostles as Luke gives it, except that Simon the Zealot is named before Jude, in order that three brothers may be named together: 1, Simon Peter, 2, Andrew, brothers; 3, James, 4, John, brothers, cousins of Jesus; 5, Philip, 6, Nathanael Bartholomew, 7, Matthew Levi, 8, Thomas Didymus; 9, Simon the Zealot, 10, James the Lowly, 11, Jude Thaddeus Lebbeus, brothers, cousins of Jesus; 12, Judas Iscariot.

Let us put emphasis on the fact that Jesus led five cousins to the holy life; that Andrew, first called, hastened to bring his brother Peter; that Philip, on finding Jesus, at once brought his neighbor Nathanael. It is brotherly, neighborly leadership that we need to learn, for one great thing, from this lesson.

Just as we are writing this lesson a story comes to us of a pastor in Washington, D. C., who, standing at the Sunday School door as usual to welcome his Sunday School one by one, asked a boy, "Aren't you ready to confess Jesus as your Saviour by joining the church?" "Yes, I am," said the boy; "and I think my mother would join too." In fact, he brought his mother and aunt and another lady all in one week. From being a little disciple he quickly became a little apostle.

On the playground we often see boys and girls who are "born leaders." Others are naturally hero-worshipers. They belong to the "follow your leader" type of mind, and so they gather about the leaders. It is a great responsibility to be a leader. If you are one, be careful you don't lead wrong. It is bad enough to go the wrong road yourself, with all the sorrow it brings even in this world. To take that wrong road means slow suicide for the leader himself, and murder if he leads another to those vices that shorten his life. But that is not the worst of it. The Bible says that one who causes another to offend had better never have been born; that he might better have been lashed to a millstone and drowned before he dragged another soul down to hell.

The Big Brother Apostle of To-day

In the nation's capital it has recently been given out that the Boy Scout movement is hindered for want of "big brothers" to lead the boys in their "hikes." Probably some good men who have the leisure do not realize that in such leadership of wholesome outings they might lead boys Godward on a week day just as surely as in teaching a class on Sunday. The writer, when a pastor, years ago, found a way through the toe to the heart in regular Monday football games with his Sunday School boys, many of whom through better acquaintance with the pastor thus secured came to know Christ.

In Dr. W. Merle Smith's church in New York City, forty men volunteered to act as "big brothers" for boys that had been before the juvenile court, most of whom were the victims of parental neglect and a bad environment. The movement has been incorporated, and Judge Hoyt of the Children's Court is its president. Each "big brother" agrees to take a friendly interest in one boy who has run afoul of the law. The movement has grown until in the year ending October 1, 1911, 2,200 boys had been cared for by 690 Big Brothers. Only 90 boys had gotten back to court, that is, only 4 per cent. There is a general secretary whose chief work is to recruit more Big Brothers, and there is a court investigator who goes to the home of each boy before he is turned over to the Big Brother. Twelve hundred boys came to the headquarters for advice and guidance in one year. Three hundred boys were sent to summer camps from two to eight weeks each, and, besides moral gain, they added an average of ten pounds each to their weight. Employment was obtained for three hundred, and homes for forty. Boys' clubs and gymnasium classes and a Big Brothers' Farm are among the helps provided by the Big Brothers for these lads. Twenty-six cities have followed New York's lead in this Big Brother apostolate for wayward boys. A similar work has been started for city girls, who need it at least as much if not more than boys.

This Big Brother Movement can have its fullest success only where the Big Brother leads the little brother to the "Elder Brother," for no child is safe until he is saved. Sunday School teachers, and even parents and pastors, can learn lessons of wise leadership from the Big Brother Movement. The Men and Religion Movement is dealing with boys' work, and the Young Men's Christian Association with the Boy Scouts in the same brotherly, neighborly way. Farther back the social settlements and institutional churches were leading old and young

TOO MUCH STARCH

A Food Problem.

An Asheville man tells how right food id that which medicines had failed to ccompiish:

"For more than 15 years," he says, "I as afflicted with stomach trouble and in- estinal indigestion, gas forming in stom- ch and bowels and giving me great dis- ess. These conditions were undoubtedly ue to the starchy food I ate, white bread, otatoes, etc., and didn't digest. I grew orse with time, till, 2 years ago, I had n attack which the doctor diagnosed as s appendicitis. When the surgeon op- rated on me, however, it was found that y trouble was ulcer of the pancreas, in- tead of appendicitis.

"Since that time I have had several uch attacks, suffering greatly. The last ttack was about 3 months ago, and I en- ured untold agonies.

"The doctor then said that I would ave to eat less starchy stuff, so I began he use of Grape-Nuts food for I knew to be pre-digested, and have continued ame with most gratifying results. It as built me up wonderfully. I gained 0 pounds in the first 8 weeks that I used rape-Nuts; my general health is better han ever before, my brain is clearer and y nerves stronger.

"For breakfast and dinner, each, I take teaspoonfuls of Grape-Nuts with cream, small slice of dry toast, an egg soft oiled and a cup of Postum; and I make he evening meal on Grape-Nuts and ream alone—this gives me a good night's est. I am well again." Name given y Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason." Read the little ook, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Sunday School Lesson

among the lowly by a similar Christ-like neighborliness. It is after all only a renaissance of the old brotherhood that God proclaimed through Moses and Jesus: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The best leader has ever been one who took the attitude of a Big Brother.

Why Not Be a Preacher?

The pastor and parent and teacher should all make this lesson an opportunity to help some one to become a preacher or a missionary. It is undoubtedly true that the strong commercialism of this age is drawing too many of the boys that are born to be leaders into money-making occupations. There are more strong churches than strong pastors to shepherd them. Vacant pulpits in every denomination appeal in vain for men to take up the noblest of all callings. We must no more leave the recruiting of the ministry to God alone than the recruiting of church members. In both we must work with God.

There are some young men who think themselves called to preach, whom no one is called to hear, and who should be plainly told by parents, teachers, pastors, and especially by theological professors, when they whine that God has called them, that they "must have heard some other noise." On the other hand there is many a boy, in his adolescent years of tenderness, when religion takes deep hold of his very soul and he longs to make the most of his life in doing good, who should be gently warned not to be "disobedient to the heavenly vision."

One way to help God win a boy to the ministry is to speak of its great privileges for doing good—to tell of how whole cities and countries have been uplifted either by a preacher himself or by some of those he has won to a Christian life. Especially should parents and teachers help God to win volunteers for the mission field by showing the great opportunities to make the most of one's life in the new China, for example, which promises to become the front of the world for a hundred years, needing not alone preachers and teachers, but Christian business men, who will show China a new type of white men in its commercial life, where white men in business have mostly hindered Christianity.

Hours Are Dollars—Save Them

WITH an International auto wagon, you can do all your road work and light hauling in one-half the time, and at less cost than with horses. You can save hours in taking your produce to the market or railroad station—save hours in going to mill or creamery.

It Will Pay You

to keep your horses in the field and have an International auto wagon do your road work. It is always ready, winter or summer, rain or shine. Sand, steep hills, snow, and mud are no obstacles. It is built to meet these conditions, and it does. With the addition of an extra seat and top, the International auto wagon is converted into a comfortable and roomy pleasure vehicle.

All we ask is an opportunity to show you that this car will make good—that it will haul your produce, and meet the road conditions in your section, no matter what they may be. A postal will bring catalogue and full information.

WHY FARM on high-priced, worn-out lands when the richest virgin soil is waiting for you in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the great Prairie Provinces of Western Canada? In many parts of the United States you have to spend as much money to fertilize an acre of your farm, as a fresh, rich, virgin acre will cost you in Western Canada. The first prize of $1,000 for the best wheat in the world was awarded to a Western Canada farmer at the New York Land Show—farmers on our low-priced lands won first, second and third prizes for wheat in competition with the world.

Go where you too can prosper, where you will find perfect health, where you can earn a farm and a home in a few years' time at most—many farmers have paid for their farms with one crop—where it does not take a lifetime of drudgery to make a competence and where energetic efforts bring riches quickly.

Land from $10 to $30 an Acre Ten Years in Which to Pay

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company offers you the finest irrigated and non-irrigated land along its lines at low figures, and on long terms of payment—lands adapted to grain growing, to poultry raising, dairying, mixed farming, and to cattle, hog, sheep and horse raising—in the Prairie Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Select your own land. Decide what kind of farming you want to follow, and let the Canadian Pacific Railway put you on the road to fortune. Magnificent soil, good climate, good markets, excellent schools, good government, all are awaiting you in Western Canada; and a great Railway Company whose interest it is to help you to succeed, is offering you the pick of the best. The best land is being taken first. Don't wait. Ask for our handsome illustrated books and maps, with full information, free. Write and investigate this great proposition to-day. Address

THE BURIAL OF THE "MAINE"

LIFT her from her shallow bed,
Pitiful with rust and scar;
Reverently remove her dead,
Slaughtered by the curse of war.

Children of the nation's heart,
Consecrated to her life;
Well they played their bitter part,
Lost alike to peace and strife.

Let the ocean be her tomb,
Let the ensign be her pall;
Let the nation's turrets boom
Requiem at her burial.

Let the memories of her fate
Find with her an ocean grave;
All the fever, storm, and hate
Write their record on the wave.

Emblem she of war's unworth,
Would that with her might go down
All the armaments of earth,
All their pomp and cheap renown,

There in darkness to decay,
While above the unfettered years
Speed the age for which we pray,
Age undimmed by blood and tears.

'Tis the will of God above;
'Tis the prayer of human wo;
That the ocean of his love
Thus o'er all our hate should flow.

HENRY HAYDEN BARSTOW.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST A. SHELDRICK, of Canton, O., has been speaking on the wonderful story of the great Welsh revival at union meetings to large audiences in different cities. He is strongly indorsed and recommended by ministerial unions and many pastors.

—DR. FRENCH E. OLIVER and his workers recently closed a series of successful meetings in Butler, Pa., at which over four thousand are reported to have decided for Christ. In the early part of March they opened a campaign at Van Wert, O., in the first week of which more than three hundred took the stand for Christ.

—GOOD REPORTS COME from a union evangelistic meeting held at Prosser, Wash., under the direction of Evangelist Robert E. Johnson, of Chicago. The Methodist, Baptist and United Presbyterian churches joined in the movement. There were many converts, among them a gentleman who had been formerly mayor of the city.

—EVANGELIST HENRY W. BROMLEY has conducted successful meetings during the present season in Iowa, South Dakota and Nebraska. At a union meeting in Wagner, S. D., there were between two and three hundred converts, many of them men. Mr. William H. Myers leads the singing. These workers ask the prayers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers for God's blessing on their labors.

—THE STATE EXECUTIVE Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association of New York is pushing a plan among the various associations to lead up to a climax in the religious work of the year by seeking to get all the young men who have become Christians in the meetings to unite with a church on or before Easter Sunday and to persuade others to decide for Christ and take their stand for him. What more beautiful way to commemorate the resurrection of the Lord than by persuading some young man to surrender his heart to Christ and to unite with his church on this day of days? Pastors and Young Men's Christian Associations everywhere should give the plan a trial.

—THE REV. V. A. M. MORTENSEN, president of the Lutheran Society of Inner Mission and Rescue Work, lectured recently at Watertown, N. Y., and as a result of his work brought about a vigorous change of public sentiment in that city. A group of fifty business men appointed a committee of five to request the mayor to order the closing of vicious resorts. The mayor called a meeting of the Board of Safety, requesting the attendance of the business men's committee and asking Dr. Mortensen to address the conference. A positive official order was given that all the immoral resorts be closed. This society is doing splendid work for the care of children and the rescue of the unfortunate.

—THE SUNDAY SCHOOL of the North Orange Baptist Church has produced some remarkable records of faithful Sunday School attendance. Loronzo L. Keys has made the remarkable achievement of not being absent from Sunday School or even late in a single session for sixteen years. Colson H. Frazee and Elwood S. Frazee have not missed a Sunday in twelve years; Miss Elizabeth Hills has been absent only once in thirteen years. Mr. Sidney M. Colgate is superintendent of the Sunday School, and presented on Washington's birthday a handsome book to each one of the forty-three members of the school who had a perfect record in attendance for 1911. Other remarkable records are held by Frederick Codey, Miss Nellie Hallock and Miss Florence Strubel, who have not missed a session in ten years; Miss Emma Rockfellow and Miss Olive Frazee, who hold a perfect record for seven years; Miss Louisa Jaquins and Miss Myrtie Wright for six years.

The Wizard Who Ends All Corns

Some years ago a chemist invented the now famous B & B wax.

To apply it we invented the Blue-jay plaster.

Since then, fifty million corns have been ended forever by this little application.

It is applied in a jiffy. The pain instantly ends. Then the B & B wax gently loosens the corn. In two days the whole corn, root and all, comes out.

No soreness, no discomfort. You simply forget the corn.

Why pare corns when this thing is possible?

Paring simply removes the top layers. It is exceedingly dangerous, for a slip of the blade may mean infection.

Why trifle with corns—treat them over and over—when a Blue-jay removes them completely, and in 48 hours. Prove it today.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

Which Tire?

No-Rim-Cut Tire
10% Oversize

Here is the Goodyear No-Rim-Cut tire—the hookless tire—the oversize tire.

The tire that cuts tire bills in two.

More than one million have been tested out. As a result, this tire outsells any other tire in existence.

Hookless Tires

Note that these tires have no hooks on the base.

They do not, like old types, need to hook into the rim flanges.

So your removable rim flanges are slipped to the opposite sides. Then they curve outward, not inward.

This tire, when wholly or partly deflated, rests on a rounded edge, and rim-cutting is made impossible.

126 Braided Wires

In the base of this tire run six flat bands of 126 braided wires.

They are vulcanized in to make the tire base unstretchable.

The tire can't come off because the base can't give. Nothing can force it over the rim flange. So hooks or tire bolts are not needed.

But, when you unlock and remove one of the flanges, the tire slips off like any quick-detachable.

It slips off much easier because there are no hooks to "freeze" into the rim flanges.

10% Oversize

To take care of your extras—to give you an over-tired car—we make these tires 10 per cent over the rated size. And without extra charge.

That means 10 per cent more air—10 per cent added carrying capacity. That saves the blow-outs due to overloading. This 10 per cent oversize, under average conditions, adds 25 per cent to the tire mileage.

We Control It

This braided wire feature, which makes this type possible, is controlled by the Goodyear patents.

Single wires have been used—twisted wires have been used—to get this unstretchable tire base. But results are unsatisfactory.

These bands of braided wires, which need no welding—which cannot break or loosen—form the only way known to make satisfactory tires of this type.

No-Rim-Cut tires are satisfactory. Be careful to get them when you change to this type.

The Passing Type
No Oversize

This is the old type—the hooked-base tire—which No-Rim-Cut tires are displacing.

23 per cent of these tires become rim-cut.

Yet these tires—wasteful and worrisome, and of lesser capacity—cost the same as Goodyear No-Rim-Cut tires.

On Same Rims

This old-type tire—this clincher tire—is on the same rim as the No-Rim-Cut tire.

All standard rims take either type.

But the removable rim flanges are here set to curve inward—to grasp the hooks in the tire base and hold the tire on.

When this tire is wholly or partly deflated the thin edge of the flange digs into it. That is the cause of rim-cutting.

If this tire is punctured or run soft, it may be wrecked very quickly, and beyond repair.

Doubled Cost

This type of tire, under average conditions, means to double one's tire cost over our new type.

It comes in this way:

Statistics show that 23 per cent of all ruined clincher tires are rim cut.

And the smaller capacity, with the average car, cuts tire mileage 25 per cent.

These are net losses, because No-Rim-Cut tires now cost no more than other standard tires.

The 13-Year Tire

Goodyear tires as made today are the final result of 13 years spent in tire making.

We have compared in that time some 240 formulas and fabrics. We have compared every method of wrapping and vulcanizing.

They have been compared on tire testing machines, where four tires at a time are constantly worn out under all sorts of road conditions.

Thus we also compare all rival tires with our own.

The result is a tire which comes close to finality.

When this tire is made oversize—made so it can't rim-cut—it means the utmost in pneumatic tires.

Some 200,000 tire buyers have proved this. No-Rim-Cut tires have thus become the most popular tires in existence.

Our 1912 Tire Book, based on all our experience, is filled with facts you should know. Ask us to mail it to you.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. D. P. P., Friendship, Me. Will you kindly inform me (1) the nationality of John Wanamaker; (2) the meaning of the word Mizpah?

1. He is an American, born at Philadelphia in 1838. 2. Mizpah, or Mizpeh, was the name of several localities in Old Testament history. The word means "a watch-tower," and in literature the whole of the beautiful remark made by Laban to Jacob (Gen. 31: 49) has been included in its meaning: "The Lord watch between me and thee when we are absent one from the other."

Miss H. R., Ashton, Idaho. Do you think it wrong for Christian people to read such fiction as Dickens's Old Curiosity Shop and Ralph Connor's The Doctor?

The early prejudice among the Puritans and some of their followers against the reading of fiction was caused by the fact that so much of early fiction was vicious. It seems very unwise now to hold to this idea, because so many works of fiction, such as the two books you mention, for instance, are distinctly helpful. When the prejudice against fiction as such is analyzed it seems difficult to find anything true or solid about it. Christ himself was a famous story-teller, his parables being, aside from their authoritative spiritual value, among the very best pieces of the world's literature. Pilgrim's Progress is fiction, and has probably done more for the cause of Christ than any other one book except the Bible. Christian people should, however, use great care in selecting books to read, and should be quick to discountenance any book which has a harmful influence. While it is not necessary to cast aside all books which depict evil, yet any book in which evil is made to appear attractive, any book written by an author who seems to like sin—an attitude that it is not unfair to say some modern writers seem to have taken—should be condemned.

Mrs. C. W., Nathalie, Va. Please explain (1) the account of Esau's selling his birthright (Gen. 25: 29-34), (2) vessels made unto honor and dishonor (Rom. 9: 21-23).

1. As the elder son of Isaac, Esau had the right to the greater part of the inheritance of his estate. But believing himself to be dying of hunger he traded this right for a meal cooked by his younger brother, Jacob. Later, Jacob secured the advantage of this bargain by deceiving his father and receiving from him the greater blessings and promise (Gen. 27). 2. This question, as well as that preceding, brings up the discussion of the whole subject of "election." The Jews seem to have gotten the idea, from their long habit of exclusiveness, that God had no right to offer salvation to the Gentiles. Paul is here trying to make them see that God has a right to offer salvation to any one. No one can dispute the fact that just as the potter has the right to form one vessel for high and honorable use and another for more humble service, so God has the right to create some souls for prominent and important and honorable service and others for more lowly tasks. However we may interpret the doctrine of election, we must not for an instant forget that God is just. "He is not willing that any should perish." He desires that every soul should have salvation and that every soul shall be fitted for successful service.

J. K., Selma, Miss. Please explain Mat.. 24

This whole chapter was prophetic in a sense: it had reference to the coming dest of Jerusalem and it also had the wider reference to the second coming of Christ. The first interpretation was fulfilled in the terrible sufferings and persecutions during the Jewish wars, which Josephus, the historian, has fully described, and which were perhaps without a parallel in cruelty. But for this merciful "shortening" mentioned in the verse, the whole nation would have perished. See the parallel in Mark 13, in which it is more clearly and definitely applied to the second coming and the persecutions to precede it, the same phraseology being used in verse 20 in the passage in Matthew. For the sake of the remnant to be afterward gathered out of the Jewish nation, these days were mercifully shortened.

G. W. F., Fairfield, Texas. Will you please give me the information as to the direct meaning and origin of the letters "I. H. S." found on crosses in Roman Catholic cemeteries and elsewhere in connection with their church and services?

"I. H. S." is an inscription or monogram which has been used by the Christian Church from a very early date. It does not by any means belong specially to the Roman Church, since it is common among the adherents of the Catholic, Greek and Anglican churches. It has been found carved on early church furniture and windows, and in many places other than ecclesiastical, including tombs, roofs, walls of houses, books, etc. It has a three-fold interpretation: one is that the letters are the initials of the words in hoc signo, which are taken from the legendary inscription of the luminous cross said to have been seen in the heavens by Constantine and his army. Another is that the initials refer to the words Jesus Hominum Salvator (Jesus, Saviour of Men). Still another, that they are the first three letters of the Greek name of Jesus. This last interpretation is based on the form and character of the very earliest Christian emblems, which were undoubtedly Greek.

W. H. H. A., Albuquerque, N. M. 1. I quote from OUR MAIL-BAG of March 20, as follows: "M. N., Geneva, N. Y. There is no passage in the teachings of Christ that can be construed as having reference to secret fraternities." How can you reconcile this declaration with the passage in John 10: 1? 2. Please tell me who is the author of the proverb "Cleanliness is akin to godliness."

1. The passage in John 10: 1, except by a strained interpretation, cannot be applied as you suggest. In the previous chapter, Jesus was speaking of blind guides, who would not see the light, and his discourse continues in the tenth chapter. There is but one door, one legitimate way into the sheepfold—the inclosure of God's true people—and no other. Those who have no true spiritual commission and who do not possess the truth in their own hearts, cannot guide others aright. While the reference was a broad and comprehensive one, it was especially aimed at the hypocritical Jewish rulers, who assumed to be the spiritual guides of the people. 2. The phrase referred to, which has passed into a proverb, is from the Mishna, the first part of the Jewish Talmud. It reads "next to godliness."

Hattie D., Mound Bayou, Miss. Where was John the Baptist when his commission came to him?

John was of the priestly race by both parents, his father, Zacharias, being a priest of the course of Abijah, and Elisabeth a descendant of Aaron. Of the first thirty years of John's life, the only history we have is contained in a single verse, Luke 1: 80. He was the chosen forerunner of the Messiah (Luke 1: 76). Dwelling alone in the desert region westward of the Dead Sea, he prepared himself for his work by discipline and constant prayer. One of his instructors, Banus (mentioned by Josephus, the Jewish historian), tells how he lived with John in the desert, eating the sparse food and bathing frequently by day and night. At last (about A.D. 25) John came forth from his hermit-like seclusion in the wild mountainous tract in Judea lying beyond the desert and the Dead Sea, and took up the work of his real office, preaching repentance and baptism, and attracting great multitudes.

Eleanor R., Worcester, Mass. What is the condition of the suffrage in China under the new government?

It may be termed equal suffrage, but that does not imply universal suffrage by any means. China has guarded the suffrage by giving it only to those who can read and write and who are not paupers or destitute. With these restrictions, it can be exercised by both sexes with equal freedom. Further, in Canton, a woman has already been chosen as one of the representatives in Parliament. It should be remembered that few Chinese women can read or write, so that their use of the suffrage must necessarily be very limited.

Mrs. C. A. H., Haviland, Kan. 1. Please explain "And all flesh shall see the salvation of God" (Luke 3: 6). 2. Were the wise men in the East when they saw the star? If so, how could they see it in the East?

1. The quotation is a literal one from the Septuagint of Isa. 40: 5. The meaning conveyed is that every obstruction shall be so removed as to reveal to the whole world the salvation of God in Christ the Saviour. 2. The "East" is not to be understood in our wide, modern sense, but referred to those countries that lie to the east as well as north of Palestine. Thus, Persia is referred to as the "East" (Isa. 46: 11). The wise men may have come from Arabia, Mesopotamia, or Egypt. The light or guiding star indicated the direction of Judea and must have been visible to them in their own land; or possibly news of it reached them there and they recognized it as a fulfilment of prophecy (Num. 24: 17). For many generations the Magi had looked for this fulfilment, and consequently were prepared for it when it did come.

The New International Joint Boundary Commission

THE International Joint Boundary Commission, which was recently organized, has been holding daily sessions in Washington, D. C. Three of the members are appointed by the United States Government and three by the Canadian Government. James A. Tawney, the former Congressman from Minnesota, is chairman of the commission. The commission, in addition to its regular duties, is to act more or less as a peace commission. All boundary disputes between this country and Canada will be brought before this commission. From left to right around the table are: Chairman James A. Tawney, General F. S. Streeter, H. A. Powell, C. A. Magrath, George Turner and T. C. Casgrain.

C. J. B., Charlotte, N. C. Multiplied creeds and the spread of denominationalism doubtless stand in the way of the unification of the Christian Church. But while it would be the ideal to have one church and one creed for all Christians, no plan has yet been advanced which would bring this about. Each denomination has the truth, but no one has a monopoly of it. To most people the old church of their fathers and mothers is very dear and they could not bear to see it absorbed by another. We believe, however, that in his own good time God will open a way for real church union, though men who have essayed the task have failed thus far.

J. H. G., Owosso, Mich. 1. Your first question is one for the individual conscience alone. If you consider it wrong to accept money for such services, why accept it? 2. God's love and mercy are boundless. He is more compassionate than we think. He has provided for all a way of reconciliation and escape, being unwilling that any should perish. If we, knowing his will and the penalty of rejection, deliberately turn aside and continue in sin, we must accept the consequences of such a course. Spiritual laws, while marked by the amplest mercy and consideration, are also just, and the results, as Scripture tells us, are unescapable. By failing in obedience, we condemn ourselves. As to the nature of the punishment and rewards, all is conjecture beyond what is revealed in Scripture. No one has a right to dogmatize on such matters, or to paint a God of love and mercy as a Moloch of cruelty and destruction. Such is not our conception of the Father of all, who loves all of his children.

Gipsy Smith Addressing the Mass Meeting at Carnegie Hall, New York City

EVANGELISTIC RALLY IN NEW YORK

YOU won't cry out for a New Gospel if you see the old one working."

"It isn't a new Bible we want; it's vision to see the old one."

"You who are doing nothing but defending the Gospel, I wish you'd stop defending it and preach it."

"It will never fail; God is in it."

"If all the people in New York who profess Christ would live Christ and work for Christ, you would soon have a revival which would shake this city from center to circumference."

"We ought to be adding new chapters to the Acts of the Apostles. What we need in these days is more acts; we have plenty of apostles."

These are some of the pungent sayings of Gipsy Smith in his address at Carnegie Hall, on April 2, on the occasion of the opening of the twelfth season of tent, open air and shop work, conducted by the Evangelistic Committee of New York City.

"I'm coming to New York for a mission some day," said Mr. Smith. "Will you stand by me?"

He waited until he got a vigorous verbal assurance from his great audience that they would.

"Will you stand by me?"

"Yes," they exclaimed.

"Now just go and do it for your own ministers."

They laughed, as he meant them to do, but the truth had gone home.

The forces of the Men and Religion Forward Movement, approaching the culmination of its sweeping campaign, united with this meeting. Over three thousand New York laymen have accepted appointments to committee work in the metropolitan campaign, and they were busy with meetings in various parts of the city. But this night was left free on their program, and the new leaders and workers of this special campaign united at this service with the Evangelistic Committee in arousing the interest of New York Christians in aggressive work. Mr. Smith is to be the speaker at a mass meeting for men to be held on Sunday afternoon, April 21.

An overflow meeting for those who could not get into Carnegie Hall—it seats 3,500 persons—was held at the Central Presbyterian Church, a few doors away, where Mr. Smith spoke before coming to the larger gathering. In the hall a chorus of five hundred voices, led by Mr. B. F. Butts, sang a number of Gospel songs and an exquisite anthem; Dr. R. B. Kimber offered prayer; Dr. Malcolm James McLeod, pastor of St. Nicholas Reformed Church, read the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah. The presiding officer, Mr. Stephen Baker, had delivered a short address, when the "Gipsy" arrived. He was greeted with applause, and introduced by Dr. Wm. Hiram Foulkes, pastor of Rutgers Presbyterian Church and chairman of the Men and Religion Forward Movement's New York Committee on Evangelism. Mr. Smith announced that instructions had been given him, whatever he did or did not do, to sing a solo. Whereupon he sang, in his incomparably sweet and sympathetic voice and manner, the simple hymn, "Pass It On."

Gipsy Smith

He said that Dr. Foulkes, who had been the manager of his Pacific Coast campaign, had asked him to tell the audience about these western meetings, and he started out to do so. But he grew so enthusiastic about contending for the absolute satisfactoriness and invincibility of the old Gospel that details and figures were overlooked. But he did relate one incident after another demonstrating the power of the Gospel of the Son of God to lead men and women to confession, repentance, faith and the new life.

Dr. Arthur J. Smith, superintendent of the work of the permanent Evangelistic Committee, showed a series of stereopticon views and statistics, illustrating its work. During the seven seasons just passed, the committee has conducted 11,274 meetings, at 230 centres, in more than ten different languages. The aggregate attendance at these services has been 2,631,062. One Italian church, one English, one Italian mission, one English rescue mission, one colored rescue mission and three Italian branches of English congregations have been organized as the result of the committee's work. From the services in the Bohemian tent thirty-eight people of that nationality united with one church. The pictures thrown on the screen showed street-corner meetings, tent meetings for adults and for children, midnight open air meetings for night workers, indoor and outdoor shop meetings and other striking scenes from the dramatic and forceful campaigns. One particularly touching photograph was that of two little French girls from Alsace-Lorraine who had been converted in a tent meeting for children, had returned to their native country and continued to work for the Saviour whom they had found in America, and were sending bright letters to their Christian friends here.

Following Dr. Smith, Dr. A. F. Schauffler, chairman of the executive committee, made an appeal for contributions to support the work for the season of 1912. He stated that he had discovered the cost to the State of New York for tracking, trying, sentencing and executing a murderer to be from $50,000

THE WITNESS WITHIN

TEXT: "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself." I. John 5: 10

THE central theme of the New Testament is the Person of Christ. And the literature of the early church is largely apologetic, and set for the defense of his divinity. Matthew's thesis is this: That Jesus fulfilled the Messianic hopes and prophecies. Mark is very bold, and opens his Gospel on this wise: "The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, the Son of God." Luke wrote in order that his friend Theophilus might be fully assured in the things wherein he had been instructed by word of mouth; and John wrote, as he says, that we "might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God." What is true in this respect of the Gospels is also true of the whole New Testament.

Jesus occupied an extraordinary place in the thought of the early church. He was to them the Messiah, the Prince of Life, the Risen Lord now exalted to the right hand of God, the one Mediator between God and man. Principal Fairbairn has said that "controversy is the condition under which all doctrinal truth is held"; and therefore the lofty claims respecting the person of Jesus could not be maintained without the keenest controversy. To the Jews these claims were a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks they were foolishness; and the hardest battles of the Christian Church were waged in the years of her youth. For three hundred years this controversy continued, until in 325 A.D., at the Council of Nice, it was voted that the Jesus of history was the Christ of God, "of one substance with the Father." And this has been the orthodox position ever since.

Christianity's Deepest Problem

The problem to-day is an old one. It does not center about the Scripture, but in the Person of Christ. It is the problem which John had in mind when he wrote his Gospel and penned his Epistles; the same which confronted those three hundred and eighteen bishops at the Council of Nice: Is he Jesus or is he Christ? Is he man, or more than man? Is he the Son of God, or only one among the many sons of God? Is he the Saviour of men, or only a shining Ideal? Is he the Object of faith, or only one who shares a faith with others? These are the questions which are bothering men both within and without the church; and the issues are altogether vital. The deepest things of the Christian faith are here involved. If Jesus is reduced to the ranks of common men, then is our religion gone.

Now, there are two ways to approach this subject. The ordinary way is to establish the authority of the Scripture documents, as a lawyer in court would establish the competency of his witnesses. When, and where, and why, were the Scriptures written? Did the writers witness the things they here record? Were they capable of interpreting the things they saw? And had they any selfish ends to serve? Having established, then, the competency of the Scripture writers, the usual method is to rest the proof upon what the Scriptures say.

I propose another course: which, however, is not new, but as old as the apostle John, and the Scripture we have before us. "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself." This is an appeal to experience as a proof of faith. It claims that assurance is not dependent upon second-hand testimony of any kind; not dependent upon what is said by Matthew, Mark, Luke or John. It maintains that Christian experience is a sure ground of Christian evidence. It appeals to the Christ who reveals himself within. And this after all is the strongest kind of evidence.

"He that believeth"; then there must have been, at the time John wrote, a well-known class of believers. "Hath the witness in himself"; then there must have been, at that time, a normal Christian experience. And the whole New Testament is made up of letters and memoirs which are based upon experience, and the impression made upon the writers by Jesus. Here, then, is the standard experience which does not tell only of the empty tomb, and the risen Christ, and the ascent from the mountain top, but tells of a Christ who dwells within; who molds and inspires, through whom one may find the Father, so that he is no longer in bondage to fear, but rejoices in danger, sings in prison, and scorns the lictor's rod. It tells of sins forgiven, and guilt now banished, and of a Christ who reinforces the will. It makes one feel he is a citizen of two worlds, with duties in this world, but having a desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better. All one is, and all he hopes, he owes to Christ. The heart leaps at the mention of the Master's name. He is to the believer a real Presence, Saviour, Redeemer, Friend, and he is worshiped as God. This is the normal Christian experience.

And this early Christian experience has been the normal experience adown the ages. It has always been, even in the darkest age of the church, that some select souls have had access to the Holy of Holies of Christian faith. There has always been this inner witness that Christ is more than an outward example, more than a posthumous influence, the witness that he has always been effecting the work of Redeemer. No one to-day need go to the first century for the primary assurance of his faith.

I was talking with a man but a little while ago. He had once a bright experience, but had subsequently lost his joy, and his despair was deep. He was walking in the fields, and of a sudden the impulse came upon him to pray. He sought out a secret spot, and spent an hour in what he called a conversation with Christ. Then, he said, he was conscious of a Presence; the Master spoke to him, or within him; and his joy returned, and his song sprang up; his work was transfigured, and his cup was full. Account for this as you will, but it happens somewhere every day. The Christ begets us, and when we waver he renews us, and fills the heart with joy; and in a hundred ways he can witness to himself within. How else does it come that we can think of God as Father, and grow in grace, and love the good and hate the evil, and long for the coming kingdom? Other men do not have these thoughts and passions. They are the marks of the Christian.

But is this experience capable of proof? I think it is. The scientific men talk about "agreement among those who have access to the facts." They make this a test for confidence and accuracy. Here, for instance, is a man who propounds a new combination of experiment, and from this he deducts a new theory. And the doubtful will say, "This man is subject to illusion, or he has wrongly stated his conclusions." But others will try the same experiment, and, reaching the same results, they will concede that the first man has rightly framed his theory.

Can this scientific canon be applied to the Christian experience? I think it can. This is well brought out by the late Dr. Dale. He makes a study of the varieties of Christian experience, and he finds these things to be common to all: a sense of pardon; deliverance from temptation; power for growing holiness; comfort in sorrow and guidance in all perplexity; and satisfaction for all the deepest needs of the soul. This was the experience of Paul; and it has been repeated, more or less completely, in all. It is not the experience of those who do not believe, and therefore it may be regarded as the work of Christ within. In him we have entered a new and happy experience.

The Christ of History the Christ of Faith

Another proof of the reality of Christian experience is this: it stands the test of the passing years. No deception can stand this test, nor endure in the face of broadening knowledge and the revelations of time. But Christian experience does. Christ reveals himself to one in the fact of conversion; and as the years go by, the content of his experience enlarges, and the heart is always satisfied. The man of faith is not deceived. He knows the Christ within, and through him he finds the secret place. He communes with him not only in the sanctuary, but also by the fireside, and at the desk of duty, and on the common street.

Now the problem is this: the relation of the Jesus of history to the Christ of experience. Are these two the same? It is the problem of the relation of the inner experience to the objective fact. And this relation is both intimate and vital.

I sometimes read the German scholars. I study them, as I keep up the study of mathematics—for the exercise it gives. And if I understand the position of some of the German scholars, it is this: that Christianity is now independent of its historical Founder; that Jesus is a kind of ladder, up which men have climbed in religious things; and that now it matters not what we may discover about the ladder itself. Indeed, we may discover that the ladder did not exist at all; and that Christ may have been but an early imagination. We have the experience of spiritual things anyway! And so they contrast the historical Christ with the Christ of experience, and faith, now glorified and divine.

I submit that this is hard to receive. It is a kind of make-believe. Let them prove that Jesus was a fancy, or even only human, and they have pauperized Christianity, and dried up the springs of religion at their source. Remove the crown from the head of Jesus, and make him just a son of Adam, and you have cut the very root of religion, and left us Christianity as a simple system of ethics.

One of the sanest living teachers is Dr. Denny of Glasgow, and he also accepts the historical method of Bible study. But he says that Jesus was always the object of faith; that the criticism that would have us believe that after the resurrection the Christ of history was displaced by the Christ of faith is beside the mark; that the Christ of faith was the Christ of history, and that no one was qualified to bear witness to him who had not had the fullest opportunity of knowing Jesus.

Faith and Knowledge

The phenomenon of the centuries is the faith of the church. And how shall we account for this phenomenon except upon the ground that Christ was precisely what the Gospels say he was? To say that he was but a great and good man is altogether insufficient. If Jesus were but a man, then our churches are but schools of ethical culture. If Jesus were the Christ, then our churches are hospitals where the sick are made well, and the dead are raised to life.

The Scripture before us has two great divisions: faith and knowledge. "He that believeth"; that is faith, and it involves the idea of volition, for faith is an act of the will. It is a commitment of life; and in its first stage it may rest upon testimony, as when the Samaritans went out to Jacob's well at the word of the woman. But in its second stage it rests upon experience, as when those people said, "Now we believe, not because of thy speaking; for we have heard for ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Saviour of the world."

There are two provinces of absolute knowledge. The one is pure mathematics, and the other is personal experience. And the latter is a field for absolute certainty no less than the first.

When good men write of Christ, the probability stands high that what they say is true. When this Gospel is confirmed by others, who have proved it, the probability is vastly higher. But when I try it myself, the witness is beyond all doubt. It is testified within. That is what the Scripture saith, "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself." Here the humblest Christian may find a sure defense against all questionings and doubt.

I submit that there is great apologetic value in this line of thought, in these days when multitudes have drifted away, and the faith of many has been submerged. These are not to be reclaimed simply by my exhortation; nor by an array of proof-texts; nor by any appeal to miracle or prophecy. But we have an irresistible appeal in the fact of Christian experience. And this is the thing that should be more generally testified. There is an old Scripture which represents that Christian people are set for "witnesses." And a witness in the court is only valuable as he testifies to what he knows. His personal opinion is not the thing for which he is asked; his judgments are not valuable. But he is expected to tell the whole truth as to what he knows. So with Christian preachers and Christian people. Too much time is wasted by preachers in gauzy theories upon irrelevancies. The thing to which they should testify is what they know of the Christ who performs his work, and bears his witness within. I worship the Christ of history, but only because he has become the Christ of experience. In this, he becomes a Saviour.

THE PREACHER

CLATTER of idle tongues, with futile shock,
Beat, as the froth of ocean on a rock;
Feeble as sting of gnats they fret his ear,
Yet he must hear them, as a judge would hear!
Must counsel childish woes, and heed each plaint
As 'twere the crucifixion of a saint!
Must feed his sheep with ever-zealous care,
And feed his children—if there's aught to spare!
For every soul that gives him of its gold,
Silver—or copper—wants its worth tenfold.
His willing feet must haste to each abode,
His tired shoulders lighten every load.
He lives for others, not for wealth or fame—
His creed forbids him glorify his name.
And when he dies? Ah, when the tired feet
Of the earth's preachers walk God's golden street,
Mayhap He, knowing each poor, futile past,
Will smile fulfilment in their souls at last!

The "Fireside University"

A MAN speaking before a large club of the most cultivated men and women in the city of Boston gave an address of such compelling interest in the beauty of its diction and in the forcefulness of its argument that all were sorry when the address came to an end after the speaker had talked a full hour. At the close of the meeting some one said to the speaker:

"From what college or university are you a graduate?"

"From the Fireside University," he replied with perfect seriousness.

"The Fireside University? I don't think that I quite understand. Where is that university?"

"It may be located in any home. In my own case it was before the fire on the long winter evenings on a farm in the Middle West."

"Do you mean that you have never been to a real college?"

"I have never had the privilege of attending even a graded school," was the reply. "I had to stop attending even the little district school when I was a lad of fourteen years. Then I became a student with my brother at the Fireside University. It is all the university I have ever known."

If the truth were known it would be revealed that hundreds of men of ability as writers and speakers, hundreds of men of wide information, have known no university or college but the Fireside University. It was the university of Abraham Lincoln and other Presidents of the United States. It is the university open to every boy in the land and he need not pass any entrance "exams" in order to get into it. The opportunities for self-culture were never so many as to-day. The free public library is to be found everywhere in the land. The best of reading matter was never so inexpensive as it is to-day. The Chautauqua courses are open to all. The Fireside University may be set up in any home and it is possible for the graduates of this university to go out into the world to climb high up the ladder of achievement. J. L. HARBOUR.

John's House Beautiful

By Eugene Thwing

JUST plain John—and nobody paid much attention to him, except when he was needed. Certainly no one saw anything wonderful or ideal about plain John. He was very insignificant, with his plain clothes, his plain face, his plain name, his plain work—very ordinary, albeit very useful. There was something wonderful about plain John, but it was hidden away from sight. He didn't really know of it himself, though he felt it, and sometimes it made him thrill strangely. Sometimes it seemed to set him on fire, but he didn't understand the feeling. Perhaps he thought it was discontent; or perhaps a hungry longing for something, he knew not what.

Plain John loved to read things in a wonderful old Book. At night, when his work was done, he went away alone and read, and as he read, he forgot that he was plain John. That strange thrill went over him; he felt like a giant or a king; he planned to do such things as those in the old Book. One night he read of a great king who built a beautiful temple. The walls were of hewn stone and boards of cedar, and the roof and the floors were planks of cedar and cypress wood. The walls within were beautifully carved in flowers and angels, and over all, even the floors, was a covering of pure gold. There was a holy place in the temple, and the description of its beauty and sacredness filled John with awe, but he felt also again that strange fire burning him. The words of the Book ran together before his eyes. He could not read, because he was talking to himself in a low, intense voice—or was he praying? No, he was only repeating something he had read, and he was not alone. Some one was standing before him—some one very bright and white. It must be to this stranger that he was saying, in the very words the great king had used, "I purpose to build an house unto the name of the Lord my God."

COME, John, the material is ready, and you shall accomplish your desire. Here is the plan. If you build faithfully, it shall be a beautiful house in which your God will delight to dwell."

John looked straight at the shining person who had spoken. Then he put down his Book and gazed around him. Great blocks of white stone, beams and boards of polished wood, vessels of gold, and many other things were piled in splendid profusion on every hand. He was not greatly surprised, but haste to begin took possession of him at once. The stranger in dazzling white, whom he took to be one sent to help him, worked always at his side, guiding, yet leaving much to his own choice. The blocks of stone and the beams seemed not heavy, though sometimes he almost dropped them, and the angel held them from falling.

John noticed that the one part of the work which seemed to give the angel more concern than all else was the foundation, underground, where its strength and perfection would never be seen. In building this John was held back and cautioned to work slowly and patiently. Afterward his eagerness was not so much restrained. The walls rose straight and firm; a splendid edifice took shape as he worked. Wonderfully constructed windows let in a flood of light to the sanctuary within, and when the fires were kindled on the altars, and all the candles were lighted, the radiance which shone out from the windows was visible to all beholders.

One of the halls he set apart as a library for books of knowledge and of quiet devotion. Many compartments were provided so that volumes on every subject might be in their proper place for instant use, and all confusion was avoided. There were chambers for needful work of various kinds, and for domestic service wherein the daily requirements of those who kept the temple might be supplied. In the center of all was the sanctuary, the place of praise and worship, and fellowship with God and man. Here an organ of many pipes, fitted for a master musician, was installed, and a choir to sing hymns of praise and thanksgiving. When the temple was completed John surrounded it with a beautiful garden of flowers, with never a fence nor a hedge to shut them in from the highway. All who passed might freely take of the bright blossoms and enjoy their fragrance, while from the open door came sweet strains of music that seemed to bless the hearer and lift up the weary traveler and make him glad.

JOHN looked upon the temple he had builded with the help of the angel, and he found it was very go His heart leaped within him for joy, and he exclaimed, "Surely I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever."

"You shall, indeed, dwell in the house of the Lord, John, and he will dwell there with thee and will not forsake thee forever." The white angel had spoken, for there he stood close to John as at first. His eyes seemed to pierce to John's very soul like a flame. But they were alone! Where was the wonderful temple? It had disappeared in the wink of an eye.

Sudden bitterness of disappointment seemed to be taking his life away in that moment, and John could not speak. He must have dreamed, and there was no temple. But no, the angel still stood with him and was speaking again. "Weep not for the vision, John; your real building is here and will not vanish. You shall truly build your house to the Lord, as you have promised; for know you not, John, that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? Build your temple faithfully, for it is holy. The foundation stones are health and righteousness. Let them be set deep and firm. The walls are built of bones and muscle. Your brain is the library; fill it with useful knowledge. The sanctuary for praise and worship, for fellowship with God and man, is your own heart; in it you may continually be making melody unto the Lord. Your eyes are the windows which flood the temple with light, and through which the holy fires from the altar of love within will shine out upon the world. Kind words and acts, friendly smiles and sympathy are the flowers whose brightness and fragrance you may give freely to all. As you build your house to the Lord, keep close to his plan and your house will grow in strength and beauty. Let it always be kept clean and pure. Then you shall be 'Plain John' no longer, for your House Beautiful will be glorified by his presence and made noble in his service."

LEAN HARD

CHILD of my love, lean hard,
And let me feel the pressure of thy care.
I know thy burden, child; I shaped it.
Poised it in mine own hand, and made no proportion
In its weight to thine unaided strength;
For even as I laid it on I said,
I shall be near, and while she leans on me
This burden shall be mine, not hers;
So shall I keep my child within the circling arms
Of mine own love. Here lay it down, nor fear
To impose it upon a shoulder which upholds
The government of worlds. Yet closer come,
Thou art not near enough; I would embrace thy care,
So I might feel my child reposing on my breast.
Thou lovest me? I know it. Doubt not then,
But, loving me, lean hard.

A Notable Ohio Revival

MIDDLETOWN, Ohio, was recently visited by the most remarkable evangelistic movement in its history. For five weeks religious services were conducted in a tabernacle erected for that purpose, with a seating capacity of 3,000. The churches of the city united in this campaign. Prior to the revival a series of prayer meetings were held daily in thirty districts of Middletown. When the evangelist, Dr. Milford H. Lyon, and his staff of assistants arrived from Chicago, the field was ripe for the harvest. People prayed as though everything depended upon God, but thev worked as though everything depended upon themselves. There was no emotional hysteria at any time. Men and women were urged to accept Christ because thoughtful consideration of God's plan of salvation commended the act as the right thing to do. Seventeen hundred marched to the front and gave their hearts to the Saviour. Not only were conversions recorded, but strong impulse was given to forces of righteousness and the entire city and county stands in the way of betterment. Three thousand men pledged themselves to fight encroachments of the liquor traffic. Five hundred, who previously had made public profession of faith in Christ, consecrated their lives to the service of the Master. On "Mid-Week Sabbath," a Thursday a few weeks ago, the business houses of the city closed their doors to give opportunity for attendance upon the special tabernacle services of the day. Big delegations found their way to the tabernacle from the factories and industrial concerns. One night the American Rolling Mill sent 1,500 men. Morning prayer meetings were held in every part of the city and special noonday lectures were delivered in the business houses. Meetings were conducted daily in all the factories, and sometimes as many as three services a day were held in the tabernacle. Following this, the churches are holding separate meetings and will continue to do so until the harvest is complete. Middletown has been for many years in the grip of the liquor interests, but there is promise now that the shackles soon will be unloosed.

A TRUE CHRISTIAN'S PRAYER

MY GOD, in me thy mighty power exert,
Enlighten, comfort, sanctify my heart;
Sweeten my temper, and subdue my will,
Make me like Jesus, with thy Spirit fill.

I want to live on earth a life of faith;
I want to credit all the Bible saith;
I want to imitate my Saviour's life,
Avoiding lightness, gloom, and sinful strife.
I want to bring poor sinners to thy throne;
I want to love and honor Christ alone;
I want to feel the Spirit's inward power,
And stand prepared for death's important hour;
I want a meek, a gentle, quiet frame,
A heart that glows with love to Jesus' Name;
I want a living sacrifice to be,
To Him who died a sacrifice for me;
I want to do whatever God requires;
I want a heart to burn with pure desires.
I want to be what Christ my Lord commands,
And leave myself, my all, in his dear hands.
O Lord! Pour out thy Spirit on my soul!
My will, my temper, and my tongue control;
Lead me through life to glorify thy grace,
And after death to see thee face to face.

OPEN MARKETS AND HIGH PRICES

More Letters from Mayors Who Strive to Solve the National Problem

IN THE second instalment of letters from mayors of leading American cities, which we print in this issue, a flood of light is thrown upon the struggle that is now going on in many States to reduce the phenomenally high cost of foodstuffs. These busy officials have taken time to tell the public, by means of the wide circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the result of their municipal experiments in economics. Their contributions have a practical value in pointing the way to other mayors who are still debating the best course to pursue. Especially do their letters possess a direct interest for householders, farmers and truck-raisers, since these must be allies in a movement of this character to assure success.

When the mayor of a big city has wrestled with the problem how to help his people, and has met with some reasonable degree of success, he is entitled to a ready hearing and to the thanks of other communities similarly afflicted. That many of the mayors have succeeded in accomplishing this through the open market is beyond question, and their letters convey a wholesome and timely suggestion to the executives of other cities where no such markets now exist. While there are doubtless many commodities that cannot be affected by such a movement, being outside of its range, even these may be reached by co-operative measures, dealing direct with the wholesaler. Meanwhile, the open market affords the speediest and most available means of relief to a very large part of the community.

On the first Wednesday in April a number of New York's enthusiastic homemakers inaugurated what is to be known as "open market day" at the old Washington Market, down on the lower West Side, under the leadership of Mrs. Julian Heath and Mrs. Arthur C. Green, the president and secretary of the New York Housewives' League. This group of women, in which were represented both those who came in their limousines and carried Gladstone bags and suitcases for their purchases, and the basket-laden wives of the Jersey or Staten Island commuters fairly stormed the old market, where they were welcomed with a brass band and by the committee of the Washington Market Merchants' Association, and where they were joined by Mayor Gaynor. The scene in the old market was one that it had not witnessed for many a long day. Smartly dressed women were doing their own bargaining with the butchers and the poulterers for roasts of beef, legs of lamb, and various kinds of fowl. The market men themselves said through their president, Carl A. Koelsch, that they were glad to welcome the real household buyers to the market and would do their best in every way to satisfy their needs.

The Dix Food Board Investigating the High Cost of Living

This photograph was taken at the first hearing of the State Commission appointed by Governor Dix of New York to conduct a general investigation into food prices and their increase. The inquiries of the board have the broadest scope, its method being to follow the various important products from the farm to the table of the consumer and thus locate the unwarranted additions to their prices. Left to right, sitting—William Church Osborne, Chairman of the Commission; Calvin J. Huson, Commissioner of Agriculture; and Ezra Tuttle. Standing—Horace V. Bruce, Secretary of the Commission; Henry F. Atherton, Counsel

Mayors Write of the Battle to Reduce the High Cost of Living

Bridgeport, Conn., Is Moving Toward the Open Market

A RESOLUTION has been introduced in the common council recommending the opening by the city of a public market place, but the matter has received very little attention thus far. If public markets would solve some of the problems of the high cost of living, I believe they should receive the endorsement of all public officials.

With Open Markets, Cincinnati Has the Lowest Prices

CINCINNATI has had open markets for many years. One or more of the market houses are open and in operation every day in the week except Sunday. Sixth Street Market, the largest, is open on Monday, Wednesday and Friday mornings from five A.M. to eleven A.M., and on Saturday afternoons from two to ten P.M. Court Street Market is held Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday mornings; Pearl Street, Monday, Wednesday, and Friday and Saturday afternoon; Findlay Market, Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday afternoon. Farmers come in with their produce from the surrounding country and only pay a nominal license fee. It is claimed that Cincinnati has the cheapest market in the country. Conditions here are just as you outline and would have them in your letter.

Mobile Has Open Markets and Low Prices

MOBILE has practically always had one or more public markets in which any one can rent a stall for a nominal charge by the month or otherwise, and therein dispose of his products. In addition, on payment of a license of twenty-five cents per day, a producer may dispose of his goods direct from house to house without going through the market. As we export through Mobile from the territory surrounding the city great quantities of vegetables and general market produce, low prices necessarily prevail here for such products; and therefore the bringing together of producer and consumer of this character of merchandise is a problem that constitutes one of our least troubles. However, the movement in other cities, less desirably situated in this respect, is one that commends itself to the press and to the people generally; and I am very glad to see that you are taking an interest in it.

Detroit Has Two Open Markets Already and Plans for More

DETROIT conducts two public markets, one on the east side, and a second on the west side. The market on the east side of the city is about three times as large as that on the west side. Both markets are reserved exclusively for farmers or gardeners who raise their commodities on their own farms; in other words, pedlers are not given permission to sell their products on the public markets. The eastern market can accommodate about seven hundred wagons, and the western market from two to three hundred. The western market is large enough for several years to come, but the eastern market has weekly overflows, and there is a strong agitation at the present time to increase its area and give it a capacity of about one thousand wagons. Up to within six months ago each farmer or gardener was charged ten cents for the privilege of exhibiting his products. In order to accommodate the citizens and give them an opportunity to do business with a particular farmer with whom they were acquainted, an ordinance was passed numbering the several places on the market, putting the numbers in a bag, and giving the farmers a chance to draw for spaces; in other words, a lottery was conducted. This course gave each farmer or gardener the privilege of having the same place the year around, the consideration being $50 a year, payable in advance. If a farmer was not in his place at 6 A.M., any other applicant could be assigned to it. About one hundred and fifty farmers have taken advantage of this "grab-bag" on the east side, and a proportional number on the west side. This agreement entitles a farmer to the same place from six o'clock in the morning to twelve o'clock noon. All others not taking advantage of this offer are assigned to places, first come first served, for ten cents a day. All farm products are offered for sale here, and although it is demanded that lettuce, cabbages, etc., be sold in bushel lots only, still this part of the ordinance is not very rigidly enforced, and patrons buy in quantities to suit their needs.

It is not the intention of the city to derive revenue from the fees, but simply to obtain enough money to pay for the expense of the upkeep of the markets, and even this revenue has not been sufficient to pay for the necessary expense, and an appropriation is needed each year to meet the anticipated deficit.

Both farmers and patrons of the market are under police protection, and public scales are available for verifying the weight or measure of purchases. The farmers generally back their wagons under the protected market sheds, and exhibit their products either on the wagon or else on portable stands. The markets are well patronized by tens of thousands of people daily. It is the intention of the city to give the citizens every possible opportunity to buy farm products direct from the producer, with as little expense as possible to the producer himself. There is a movement on foot now to establish a third market in the northern part of the city.

How Jacksonville Solves the Problem of High Prices

WE HAVE in this city no public marketing-places, our markets being scattered throughout the city, for which a license is charged at each market place. Farmers and fishermen have the right to peddle vegetables, fruit, fish, shrimp, etc., if raised or caught by themselves, without paying a license, which gives them the benefit of our local markets. There has been no disposition shown by any of our councilmen to change our present method.

MOVING DAY IN IDOL-LAND

The Moving God's Procession Leaving the Railway Train

A Line of Devotees Along the Route to the Temple

MOVING day! We know pretty well what that means at home! May 1 it is in New York State, if my memory serves me well, and it means housecleaning, beating rugs, bare floors, and meals eaten hurriedly off the kitchen table with steel knives and scanty plates. But, as we may well suppose, when "divinity" moves it is quite a different proposition. Not that it is an unusual event for the wooden majesties of Japan. Oh, no! They flit from place to place quite as much as do the people, many of whom have a close acquaintance with the art of moving between darkness and daylight to miss the rent collector. It is when some renowned idol—some grandee of the wooden tribe—takes a notion to change his residence, that all the countryside is in an uproar and turns out to see the event.

There was an occasion of this kind at Tsurumi, near Yokohama, not long ago. The idol who moved was the chief image of the Sodo sect. The theology, or better, the philosophy of this sect, is too deep for us Occidentals to grasp; even the name of its founder contains thirty-five Chinese characters. So I will call his name "for short"—Jodaishi. This good gentleman was a hermit-like priest in the dim, forgotten past, and the philosophy of the existing Sodo sect was sufficiently tinged with the spirit of asceticism to suit him; so he joined it and, away out on a lonely promontory that juts into the Japan Sea, founded a temple which became the headquarters of the sect and the home of our hero. At thirteen he became a priest, and before his death had not only founded the temple, but so reconstructed the Sodo sect that he is looked upon as one of the founders. This was way back in 1226 A.D., and since that distant time the idol, who moved on this occasion, has been dwelling there.

Some half dozen years ago, fire laid the old temple in ashes, and conferences were almost immediately begun as to where they should build the new home for this their chief idol, which is an image of Buddha, about three hands high. The old idol thought, or rather his advisers thought for him, that in this modern age it was the duty of a progressive and able Buddha to live near the capital, whither every Japanese with the slightest ambitions in life hopes to come. Still, as he was a Sodo Buddha, he must live in a silent retreat, and so Tsurumi was chosen, among the hills between Tokyo and Yokohama, and there on 100,000 tsubo (600,000 square feet) of land, so the Japanese papers state, stand twenty-six buildings, forming the chief temple of the sect—and not the least among these is the kitchen, showing that the inner man is not forgotten in their reveries.

On the great morning, everything had been prepared for the arrival of the Butsuzo (statue of Buddha). A road was built from the station to the temples, and spanned with great evergreen arches. Tents were put up on the grounds for lunch places, hospitals for the Red Cross, police stations, fire department, and even a post, telegraph and telephone office. The roadway was lined with little shops, the keepers squatted on the ground and selling everything imaginable, from lovely, indigestible little cakes to the latest mechanical toys and dress goods. The program of the day called for the arrival of the idol at nine or nine-thirty A.M., and so the crowds came early, arriving on the special trains from Yokohama and Tokyo in thousands. When the "foreigners" arrived, they found the road lined on either side many deep, women predominating, and all bearing flags or other emblems to show that they were believers from such and such a temple come to worship at the arrival of the image. These good folk, often from many miles inland, gazed with deep interest at the foreigner, and passed many a remark, thinking he would not understand. But the "foreigner" kept on his way until he reached the high ground near the temple, where the best view was to be had.

Now, it must always be remembered that this is "the land of inconsequent time," and if the common people are never prompt, how could it be expected of a divinity! So there was not much to do but watch the people, and the loads of presents of rice paste being carried in for the idol—enough of it so that one would have grave fears for his "honorable insides" if he did not know that they were of wood.

At last, about noon, he lands at the station, and a stir begins in the crowds below. Pretty soon a file of police break through, and then comes—horror of horrors!—a real foreign band. Our wooden friend is rather modern in his tastes! Then comes another long lull, enlivened with day rockets, prayer-laden toy balloons rising heavenward, and the kindly efforts of a Japanese student who has a smattering of English, and who politely misinforms us that the temple cost a million yen ($300,000), and that there are about 200,000 people gathered on the grounds, who are "All Buddhist. Not Christ. But some Buddhist-Christ too, I think." What do you suppose inspired that last remark?

Then the procession comes on again, led by lines of shaven priests upon whose shiny heads a daring dragon-fly frequently lights, to the great pleasure of the onlookers. Finally, the high priest himself appears, clad in a glittering array of silks, and escorted by the mayor of Tokyo. He immediately precedes the image, which is borne on a lacquered stretcher, covered with a box, and draped with scarlet silk, whereon is embroidered in gold crests similar to those of the imperial couple. Amid the painful squeals exuded by a native band, the procession disappears within the temple.

After that, there is nothing for the foreigner to do but wander around and watch the people getting the free lunch which comes with their tickets, and their flags, get a bite of Japanese food himself, beg a believer's flag from a kind-hearted lady, assuring her that the people at your house will be delighted to get one, and then go home.

Harrisburg Powerless, as Private Companies Own the Markets

I AM in sympathy with the open market proposition. We are situated in an agricultural district and have public markets such as you describe. These market buildings are owned by private companies, who charge the farmers and truck-raisers a nominal sum per week for stall rent, and the produce is offered to the public at first hand. Of course, there are some jobbers and middlemen, who occupy the markets; but we find that the farmers themselves regulate the prices to a great extent. They get together before the opening of the market and fix the price on the leading articles for sale, and any new or late arrival always consults his neighbor as to the selling price. So you can see they practically have a pretty strong "trust," as it might be called. Another bad feature: oftentimes local dealers go to the markets and buy up various products to sell again, and then they, at certain seasons of the year, go to the farmers and truck-raisers and get them to agree on a certain price, agreeing to take off their hands all unsold products.

As these markets are owned by private companies, the city has no authority to regulate the price.

Prices Are Not Oppressive in New Haven, Writes Mayor Rice

WE DESIGNATE one of our streets for the purpose of permitting farmers and market gardeners to come in and sell their goods. I do not think there is any great need of taking this matter up in this city, as our grocers and marketmen are quite reasonable in their prices, and I think, on the whole, the public is very well satisfied with the present system. "Thou Art the Man"

ALMOST every man is interested in religion. The majority of men are not only interested in religion, but have certain religious convictions which they like to defend. They are pleased with sound doctrine and like to witness successful religious effort.

But many of these very men stay outside the church, or, if they come in, become only nominal rather than enthusiastic and aggressive Christians. They like to hear a good exhortation, but they do not like to heed it; they like to read good advice, but they do not like to take it. It slips off their shoulders somehow; they think it is capital counsel for Brown or Smith, but they do not take it directly to themselves.

A man like this needs some old-fashioned prophet to walk straight up to him and, looking him squarely in the eyes, declare: "Thou art the man." It is you who ought to turn from all sin; it is you who ought to begin an ardent, faithful life of spiritual service; it is you who ought to be not only listening to Gospel testimony, but giving it. Knowledge of the truth brings with it terrific responsibilities. "Ye knew your duty and ye did it not" is a judgment from which there can be no appeal.

Gentler, though not less earnest, are the words of Jesus: "If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them."

Who is the man on your street, in your town, in your office building, or in your township, who ought to be the most zealous and hearty in his service for God? Who is the man who ought to be the truest and cleanest Christian? Who is the man who ought to be the most strenuous in trying to win men to the kingdom of Christ? Who is the man who ought to repent most deeply of his past neglect, and trust most humbly now for the pardon and grace of God? Who is he? You know who he is. You write his name every time you make your signature.

Coal and World Progress

MOST of the world's great discoveries have been born of the stress of emergency. If the present widely extended coal strikes, which for a time seemed to threaten the industries of the nations, should be the means of concentrating the efforts of scientists and inventors on the task of producing a substitute for coal which could be widely used, then the strikes would have brought to civilization a great compensation. The use of coal in America dates only to the discovery of the "black stones" in Pennsylvania about a century ago by a hunter who had kindled a fire of twigs and branches upon a little heap of what he believed to be simply broken and blackened fragments of rock, but which he found red and luminous when he awoke next morning. But the use of coal elsewhere is of much older date. Coal cinders have been found amid the ruins of ancient Roman camps in England that were the débris of fires kindled over fourteen hundred years ago. Coal is many times mentioned in the Bible, although the translators who framed the Authorized Version employed the word "coals" in a liberal sense, and it cannot now be stated with any degree of assurance whether the "coals" of Scripture were really charcoal or anthracite or bituminous coal, such as has been found in Palestine in modern times.

For a full century at least coal has been indispensable to the world's progress. Every year has witnessed an increased output and consumption to an extent, as geologists now warn us, that threatens to exhaust the world's supply available within the next half hundred years at most.

Science has already begun to cast about for a substitute for the universal fuel. In the true spirit of modern progress, the little Swiss republic is courageously venturing on an experimental solution. That country, which is rich in water power, will undertake—so the cables state—to banish the use of coal and supplant it, at the earliest date practicable, with electricity generated by water power for manufacturing, transportation by land and water, lighting, heating, cooking, and for every other requirement, public and domestic. Should the Swiss Government be successful, it will be a beginning of the revolution that will result in dethroning King Coal wherever water power exists that can be rendered available. King Coal has had a long and turbulent, yet a most useful reign. His empire is world-wide, his power greater than that of any contemporary monarch. Here, he has the richest territory of all, for the coal area in the United States is many times greater than that of any other country. He has mines in no less than thirty-five States, those in twenty-nine States being large commercial producers, with an aggregate annual output of 170,000,000 tons, and an army of 400,000 miners. It is this vast force of workers, most of whom toil under ground, who are now taking a respite from labor while the pending question of a strike or a compromise is being discussed. For the first time in many years, the grimy battalions have forsaken the pits, the shafts and the gloomy galleries of the underground kingdom to which they will shortly return. Then the world will breathe easier when it knows that the pick and shovel and drill are busy again.

King Coal has been a true friend of human progress, and in spite of repellent features, he has done incalculable good in the world. It may be a long way to look ahead, yet one can almost foresee the abdication of the grimy old monarch who, with all his benefits, has been a sad destroyer, taking a mightier toll of victims every year than all his rivals combined.

Religious Toleration in Japan

VERY significant, as an indication of the increasing friendliness with which the ancient East now views Christianity, was the recent Conference of Religions held in Tokyo, Japan. It was the first occasion on which Christianity was formally and officially recognized in that country as entitled to equal rights and privileges with Buddhism and Shintoism. At the conference were fifty-six Buddhists, thirteen Shintoists and seven Christians (the latter representing Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, Congregational, Episcopal, Catholic and Greek churches), and the imperial government was represented by four members of the cabinet and several chiefs of bureaus. It was a very dignified and exclusive assemblage, and no outsiders were admitted. All the delegates united in a joint resolution favoring co-operation in politics, education and religion for the improvement of social and moral conditions and the development of civilization, "each religion, however, strictly observing its own province of operations." Harmonious relations were declared to be essential to the nation's prosperity. It would be difficult to overestimate the importance of this recognition of the Christian faith in a country where it has been under a ban. It will greatly assist in removing the prejudice which has existed even among the more intelligent Japanese, for government approval goes a long way in Japan. What the emperor and his ministers sanction or permit, no loyal son of Nippon will call in question. Hence great results may flow from the conference, which should mark the beginning of a new forward movement in Christian work in that country.

Aged Saints

IT WOULD seem to be a hard lesson for some people to learn that the heavenward path is one of many stages, and that they who have been longest on the journey have reached and passed landmarks of Christian experience far beyond those of most men who have but recently begun the pilgrimage. In Bunyan's allegory, Faithful knew more than Christian did about the path and its perils and how to overcome them. Every old saint has encountered at times the familiar trials—temptations, doubt, despair, false guides, and deceiving philosophers who would seduce the anxious, troubled soul from its allegiance. Among the helps heavenward that we may safely trust, there are few more serviceable than the testimony of those who have preceded us on the same highway and who have met the very troubles we ourselves have yet to face. Just as the young and untried warrior may sit at the feet of the veteran and learn practical wisdom, so we do wisely to profit by the experience of those who have grown gray in the Lord's battle. These reflections come to us whenever we hear of the aged minister, ripe in spiritual experience, but too far spent physically for active service, being flouted by the younger for his "old-fashioned theology." Some of the latter, allured by the fascinating but doubtful doctrines taught in various schools, and fired with the ambition for intellectual display, have foolishly imagined they are called to reform the old Gospel by eliminating the supernatural. And when the old pastor, who has long ago fought out that battle with his own soul, ventures a word of caution or rebuke, he is often brushed aside contemptuously. Often but not always, for there are some who hear his words with profit and who give reverent attention to one who, having reached that borderland where the veil that hides the future is thinnest, has a vantage of spiritual vision and understanding such as they may only hope to reach after a long life lived near to God and in his constant service.

General Notes

—HON. EMIL SEIDEL, Socialist mayor of Milwaukee, was defeated in his campaign for re-election by Dr. G. A. Bading, the fusion candidate, by a vote of 43,177 to 30,200. Twenty-six non-partisan and seven Socialist aldermen were elected.

—NO SCIENTIFIC announcement of the last few years has caused greater comment than that of Sir William Ramsay, the noted English scientist and inventor, who a short time ago proposed that coal be consumed in the mines. In addressing the Smoke Abatement Exhibition in London he suggested that an ideal state of things would be to have retorts in the bowels of the earth to produce gas for power. "I firmly believe," he said, "that something will be done in the way of not raising coal but letting it remain underground, burning it there, and taking off the gases. I have been in communication with a large colliery proprietor, and he is going to give me a chance of making an experiment on a very small scale. If this succeeds, a candle may be lighted in England, which will not be extinguished in our time."

—FLOODS IN THE Mississippi Valley have caused great damage and distress. The suffering was so great that President Taft urged Congress to make an appropriation for the relief of the people in the flooded districts. On April 2 Congress made a special appropriation of $350,000 for strengthening the levees and building new dikes. Up to April 3 eight lives had been lost and at some points the river was still reported to be rising. At Cairo, Ill., the water touched the mark of 53.9 feet, a higher point than had ever before been recorded. Great damage was done at Memphis, Tenn., Columbus, Hickman and other cities of Kentucky, as well as in towns of Missouri and other river States. Three thousand persons were made homeless at Hickman, and twelve hundred were driven from their homes at Memphis. Thousands of acres of farm land were inundated; near Chester, Ill., 30,000 acres were under water. Food supplies ran short in many places; heroic work was done by the men who guarded and strengthened the levees; women kept busy bringing food and coffee to the men on duty. At Cairo all business houses except restaurants were closed, and thousands of gallons of hot coffee were distributed free of charge. Efforts were made by steamboat crews to rescue live stock in the flooded areas, but great numbers of sheep and cattle perished.

A Fearful Mine Disaster

THERE was a gas explosion in the Jed Coal and Coke Company's mine at Jed, W. Va., the other day. Eighty-two precious lives were snuffed out. Only eleven men escaped alive, and one of those died within an hour after being brought to the surface. When the explosion occurred only the eleven men working at the foot of the shaft had a chance for their lives. They made their way up in the cages which were not damaged. In half an hour after the news had reached Welch, W. Va., six miles away, relief measures were under way. Oxygen helmets and other appliances were rushed from nearby mines, a government mine rescue car was turned back by telegraphic orders, and another car was rushed from Pittsburg. State mine inspectors promptly organized rescue parties, and as the gas cleared away scores of dead bodies were revealed. There is deep lamentation among the families of the victims, and outside financial aid will be called for. Human life in this country is too cheap a thing. The boy is not counted high enough above the gunnysack, nor the miner above his car of coal. There is enough peril in any vocation in these civilized times, and the extra hazardous callings must be guarded by better laws of the nation and State. The fearful disaster of the mines is nearly equal to the slaughter of the sword thus described:

Girl Taught Scientists

MISS FAY M. HARTLEY, the young daughter of a Nebraska farmer, gave a surprise to a group of distinguished men who were discussing national economic questions at the American Academy of Political and Social Science in Philadelphia the other day. Speeches had just been made by some of the leading authorities of the country on economic abuses, but none seemed able to indicate a remedy for the trouble. A little figure in homespun dress, with rosy cheeks and eyes shining with determination, arose in the rear of the hall just as the chairman was about to close the session. She pleaded for five minutes, which were gallantly accorded. She mounted the platform and began a talk that made the distinguished speakers open their eyes. Instead of beginning with the colleges and dealing with fine-spun theories concerning the industrial and economic situation, she told them they should begin with the farm, the basis of all industry, and the measure of national thrift. When the farmer's daughter had finished, the dignified audience applauded to the echo. It was a delightful change from the high-flown oratory and dry statistics to which they had been listening. She stood there smiling, and they pelted her with questions, all of which she readily and cleverly answered. The Nebraska farmer girl had taken the honors of the occasion. The primal importance of farming is recognized in the Scripture:

Moreover the profit of the earth is for all. (Eccles. 5: 9.)

Pink Tea for Poodle

A SOCIETY débutante of Baltimore gave a birthday tea recently in honor of her pet French poodle Bunny. Her younger sister and a friend assisted in the affair. The dogs of the smart set had baths and were powdered and perfumed, and those who did not go to the home in automobiles made the journey afoot. The owner of Fluffy Ruffles notified her hostess that her pet was ill and could not attend, but several other swell dogs were there. All the latest designs in spring dog fashions were displayed, and some of these, not to mention the ribbon bows, were damaged in two or three fights that took place on the pavement before the dogs were gotten into the house. A tempting menu was served to the pets on saucers. All the good doggies were served by the ladies, while those which were disposed to growl were allowed to feed themselves. This is another example of the intellectual emptiness and social folly of the idle life of wealth and luxury. New devices for killing time, the monkey dinners of Newport, the male and female dogs used for bridesmaids and groomsman at a wedding in New York, and the poodle-dog pink tea in Baltimore are parodies on and mockeries of healthful social functions, and ridiculous substitutes for the provision of food for the bread line for men, and relief for the little orphan children. This empty vanity is pitiable. The words of the wise man are recalled:

He that followeth vain persons is void of understanding. (Prov. 12: 11.)

Fatal April Joke

AS THE result of an April fool joke, James G. Stewart, of Sound Beach, Conn., is dead and Ronald Hedges, a fellow employee in a grocery store, is in jail charged with having killed him. Stewart, who had been in the country less than a year, was told by Hedges to take a wrench from the barn to a clerk in the store who wanted it. It was only an April fool joke, and Stewart was so angry that on his return to the barn he knocked Hedges down with the wrench. Hedges waited till he saw Stewart looking down into a bread barrel, and slipping up to him hit him a terrible stroke with a hammer on the head. The injured man died at the hospital a little later. Hedges, when he learned that his companion was dead, fainted with grief and cut a deep gash in his neck with the brass taken from an electric appliance, which may prove fatal. There is much innocent fun for children and older people on April fool's day. It is not infrequent that serious trouble arises from jokes carried too far. This tragedy was unnecessary and regrettable. Human hate is dangerous, and is easily stirred. Only a joke was necessary to fan the spark into a fatal blaze. Those who are ill-tempered and irritable with their fellows, even those who belong to the church and profess to be followers of Christ, often show symptoms of hate that is counted righteous indignation, but which the apostle called murder.

Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer. (I. John 3: 15.)

Amazing Progress of the South

THE Manufacturers' Record recently published its thirtieth anniversary edition, in which it records the marvelous material progress of the Southern States since 1880. These are some of the facts: In 1880 the total individual deposits in the national banks of the South were $73,124,523, as compared with a total for the United States of $873,537,637. To-day the individual deposits in the national banks of the South aggregate $957,428,510, or $8,900,000 more than the individual deposits in all the national banks of the United States at that time. Since 1880 the population of the South has increased 77.5 per cent., but in the same time its individual deposits in national banks have increased 1,209 per cent., and deposits in other financial institutions 908 per cent. It has in the same period increased its capital invested in manufacturing 930 per cent., its capital in cotton mills 1,304 per cent., its capital in cottonseed oil mills 2,452 per cent., and its expenditure for public education 525 per cent. In 1880 the South expended on its common schools $12,471,000. Last year it expended for the same purpose $78,000,000. This very great increase in common-school expenditure has not been due to any spasmodic growth, but to a steady expansion of expenditures from the very day when the South emerged from the poverty and destruction of the war. The production of coal in the South last year was 115,000,000 tons, as compared with a total for the United States in 1880 of 71,481,000 tons. The South's production of petroleum last year was 85,000,000 barrels, as compared with 26,000,000 barrels for the United States in 1880. The South now has in operation 11,356,000 cotton spindles, in many lines of cotton manufacture equaling the Lancashire district of England. Agriculture has shown almost as rapid an increase, although the concentration of energy has been to a greater extent in the development of industrial operations. The total value of farm products of the South last year was $3,000,000,000, a gain as compared with 1880 of 296 per cent. But the most amazing thing is that it exceeded by $700,000,000 the total value of the farm crops of the United States in 1880. Scarcely in the history of the world has such an empire arisen out of the confusion and bankruptcy of civil war as the New South. Fortunately since 1880 its moral and religious progress has kept pace with its marvelous material progress. The people of the South believe in the Bible, and in orthodox Christianity. They have outlawed the saloon from two-thirds of the territory, and from twenty-two of the twenty-five million of its population. It has fought gambling and other vices with a vigorous hand. In contemplation of the glorious progress of the New South, the words of the Psalmist are suggested:

The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage. (Ps. 16: 6.)

Importing Potatoes

THE poor potato crop this year has made it necessary to look abroad for part of the supply for home consumption. The steamship Minnehaha the other day brought from Europe six thousand tons of potatoes for the American market. In 1908 we imported 8,383,969 bushels. In 1909 we bought abroad but 353,208 bushels. Some idea of the importance of the potato as a staple article of food may be had when it is known that in 1910 the United States raised 338,811,000 bushels, valued at $187,985,000. The world's crop in 1909 amounted to 5,523,864,000 bushels, of which North America produced 477,896,000 bushels and Europe 4,964,152,000. And it is interesting to note that the great industrial State of New York in 1910 raised 44,676,000 bushels, leading all other States. Michigan, Pennsylvania, Maine and Wisconsin ranked next in the order named. Wisconsin's crop was 24,700,000 bushels. Christopher Columbus told Queen Isabella that if she would fit out the expedition for him he would bring her back a shipload of gold. He did not get the gold, but he did find the natives smoking dried leaves with fire at the end—the tobacco of modern commerce; and also an article of food worth many gold mines—the potato. That article seems to be a necessity to the nations of Europe and America. The divine provision of food for man is mentioned in the very beginning of the Scripture:

Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things. (Gen. 9: 3.)

The Bridge of the Seas

BY

REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.
Founder and President Christian Endeavor

A Greek Peasant in Holiday Dress

The Canal That Connects the Adriatic and Ægean Seas

A Greek Girl from the Isthmus

THE Bridge of the Seas" is the striking name which Pindar gives to the narrow isthmus which connected the Gulf of Corinth with the Ægean Sea. It is one of the most interesting strips of soil on the five continents. It is the Isthmus, par excellence, of all the world; for from its Greek name, Isthmia, every other isthmus has been named.

The ancients were not good sailors. They never went by sea where they could conveniently go by land, and to cross this narrow neck of land, only four miles wide, saved them many a weary league of sailing around a stormy coast in going from the Peloponnesus to Attica, and indeed from Europe to Asia.

The southeastern point of Attica was especially dangerous, and an old proverb used to run: "When you are rounding Cape Malia, forget all you have at home." Indeed, navigation in these seas was almost wholly abandoned in the winter months, and we remember that in the graphic account of St. Paul's shipwreck, he advised the captain to winter in the Cretan harbor of Fair Havens. Through disregarding this advice, disaster came to ship and crew and prisoners alike.

No wonder, then, that the Isthmus, which the ancient city of Corinth dominated, became at one time the busiest and perhaps the most notable strip of land which the world knew. More battles have been fought, more dynasties established or dethroned just here, in all probability, than in any other spot on the earth's surface.

Corinth, the great city of the Isthmus, was called "the City of the Two Seas" in ancient poetry. Many attempts were made to cut through this narrow neck, or at least many great rulers had considered the feasibility of doing so; among them, Julius Cæsar, Hadrian, and Caligula. Nero actually began the cutting in the year 52, at the very time when Paul was a resident of Corinth.

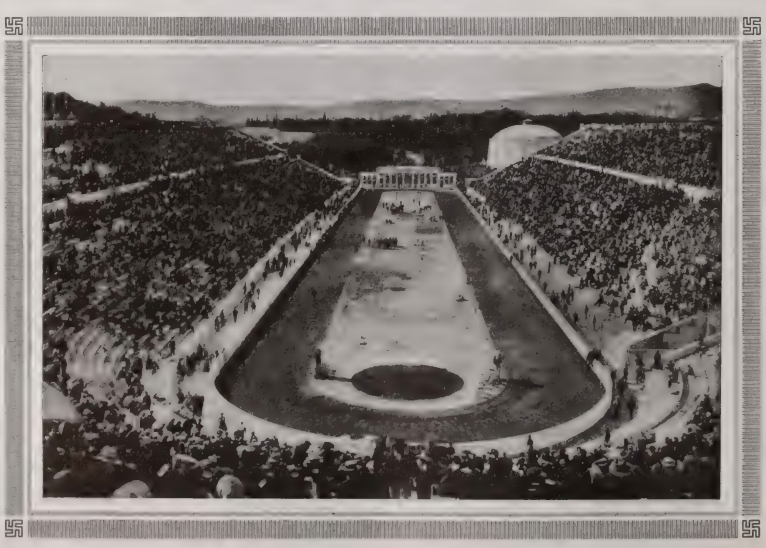
Many unsuccessful efforts seem to be the forerunners of every great success in canal digging. The Suez Canal was attempted centuries before De Lesseps carried it through to a triumphant completion. The Panama Canal was the dream of many generations and the scene of more than one abortive effort before President Roosevelt's engineers gave assurance of success. Even the Cape Cod Canal was projected by the Pilgrim Fathers more than two hundred years ago, and was attempted more than once. Now, after three serious attempts, it is nearing completion. Nero's effort to dig the Corinthian Canal was soon given up, though traces of his great ditch can still be seen. It was not until 1893 that the dream of Cæsar, Hadrian, Caligula and Nero came true, and after twelve years of toilsome labor, and after expending $12,000,000, a channel four miles long and seventy-five feet wide was cut through the friable sandstone rock, and the waters of the Adriatic were wedded to the waters of the Ægean.

We are especially interested in the Isthmus, however, because it was the chief seat of the Greek games, the athletic contests to which St. Paul is so largely indebted for his imagery. "Nothing is more remarkable," says a distinguished authority, "than the number and magnitude of the theaters and stadia in the ruins of the great cities of Asia Minor. A vast number, too, of the inscriptions relate to the public amusements. It is evident that these amusements must have been one of the chief employments of the population."

If any future historian should read our own newspapers two thousand years from now, he would come to the same conclusion concerning the American and English people. Supposing that our pulp paper could possibly last so long, he would find in the daily journals of the nineteenth century after Christ accounts of the same devotion to athletic sports as the monuments of Greece and Rome describe. Two pages devoted to football, baseball, hockey, golf, tennis, according to the season, the future historian will find in our daily newspapers; one scanty paragraph devoted to education or religion. He will learn from the students' records that our universities were emptied by a baseball game, that all the students would travel hundreds of miles to see a football match; but he will learn very little of the studies pursued, of the debates between contending colleges, or of things strictly academic. Let us hope and pray that the decadence and final destruction, which undoubtedly were hastened for Greece and Rome by the undue absorption of the people in mere sport, may not for the same reason overtake America and England!

As I have said, though these games were celebrated throughout the Roman world in Paul's time, in Asia Minor as well as in Italy and Greece, in his native city of Tarsus, in Ephesus, even in Jerusalem, yet the Isthmus of Corinth was one of the four chief "sanctuaries," where the most celebrated games were held. Every second year the great national athletic festival was held here, and it is known that one of these festivals occurred in the year 53 of our era, and that in all probability Paul came to Corinth in the autumn of 52, and left in the spring of 54.

These coincidences make his numerous allusions to the games of very great interest when we remember that only a very few miles from Corinth, at a place now called Isthmia, on the Ægean side of the Isthmus, one of the great celebrations which attracted the attention of the whole known world occurred during his residence in Corinth. Undoubtedly he went to these games, for he was always eager to be where people congregated, that he might lose no chance to speak a word, or exert some influence, for the great cause which was so near his heart.



The Great Stadium at Athens and the Crowd at the Olympian Games

Many would have wondered that Paul, surrounded as he was during his residence in Corinth by some of the most charming and magnificent scenery in the world, never alluded to it in his letters. Why did he not point his moral, as his Lord doubtless would have done, by referring to the striking summit of Acro-Corinth which towered over the whole plain, or to the magnificent hills of Peloponnesus, to the blue waters that laved the shores on either side of Corinth, or to the striking neck of land that has given its name to every isthmus? Why did he not allude to the birds that sailed, then as now, over the smiling vineyards and olive groves; or to the fish which, then as now, the brawny peasants daily

Secretary of State Knox

Primitive Musical Instruments of the Indians

SECRETARY KNOX has come and gone. It is reported that Mr. Knox said that the ovation tendered him by President Cabrera of Guatemala far surpassed anything the sister republics of Central America had given.

If there is anything that Guatemala and President Cabrera know how to do it is to entertain. At great cost a statue of Liberty was erected at a junction of the two streets leading from the railroad station to the Plaza de Armas. The buildings all along the way were handsomely decorated with the Stars and Stripes and the blue and white of Guatemala. The streets were a carpet of green, made of pine needles brought from the evergreen forests of the adjoining mountains. Ten thousand Indians in attractive costumes, thousands of school children, besides the dignitaries of the government and many officials and influential citizens from all parts of the republic, were in the grand procession.

The apartments where Mr. Knox and his party were entertained were exquisitely furnished, and the banquet tendered him was sumptuous. We trust his coming will bring Guatemala and all Central America into closer touch with the United States.

We have been laboring here in Central America for nearly sixteen years, under the auspices of the Central American Mission, of which the well-known Dr. C. I. Scofield of "Scofield Bible" fame is the founder and honored secretary. In this city we have a congregation of over one hundred and seventy-five baptized members. There are twenty out-stations and fifteen native evangelists and pastors connected with this center. One of our greatest needs to-day is a larger constituency that will pray and give of their means to push the work which God has so marvelously blessed. There are one million Indians living in the republic of Guatemala. They are industrious, hard-working people—nothing like the roving, hunting Indians of the United States. There are, in all, seventeen distinct dialects. In the largest tribe are 300,000, and only one missionary at work. The sixteen other tribes number from 130,000 down to 2,000, and they have no foreign missionary working exclusively in any one of these tribes.

We are crying unto God continually for a devoted missionary who will give his life to these needy ones. Will not our friends in the United States take up the need and help us in our cry to God for these for whom Christ died as much as he died for you and me?

A. E. BISHOP.

Guatemala City, Central America.

Since this letter was written Secretary Knox has visited Santo Domingo, Port au Prince, Havana, St. Thomas and a number of other West Indian ports. At each of these places Mr. Knox was heartily received and royally entertained. His visit to San José, the capital of Costa Rica, was made the occasion for a great celebration there, and in Havana the city officials expended thousands of dollars in decorations and entertainment for his visit.

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

drew from the deep in their great seining nets? Some have ventured the theory that Paul had some affliction of the eyes (his thorn in the flesh, perhaps) which prevented his seeing clearly the beauties of nature. It seems more probable to me that he drew his illustrations from the games because he knew they would appeal to his hearers. In at least one instance (I. Cor. 9: 26), St. Paul alludes to the boxing contests. "So box I," he says, to use the original Greek word, "as not beating the air." Once he alludes to the gladiatorial contests with wild beasts (I. Cor. 15: 32), a sport foreign to the Greek nature and genius, and introduced by the more blood-thirsty Romans. But usually his allusions are to the purely Greek games, especially the foot-races in the stadium, such as he undoubtedly saw at Isthmia and very likely at Athens, where they have been recently revived in the great Olympian games held here in recent years.

It was my fortune to be in Athens in an Olympian year, and I often visited the magnificent stadium, built originally by the statesman and orator Lycurgus nearly four hundred years before Paul's day. Two hundred years later, by Herod Atticus, the seats and partitions were renewed in solid marble from Pentelicus, "almost exhausting its quarries," we are told. For centuries the very site of this stadium was well-nigh lost. Its seats were stripped of their costly marbles, and it was covered by the débris of ages.

Within a few years it has been again restored in all its former grandeur by the liberality of a Greek merchant, M. Averof. Again the athletes have gathered from all parts of the world for the foot-race and the vaulting, the wrestling and the discus-throwing. Again kings and queens have graced the marble throne as in the olden days.

The Athenian stadium of to-day is one of the most imposing enclosures in the world. A hundred tiers of splendid marble seats completely surround it, except at the entrance end, divided into thirty sections, each seat in each section affording ample room for thirty people. A little sum in arithmetic will tell us that in a single tier around the stadium nine hundred people can sit, and in the one hundred tiers no less than ninety thousand people can find ample accommodation to witness the international games. It was this very stadium that Paul doubtless visited in Athens, and a similar one in Isthmia; and as I saw the gathering athletes practicing for the final contests—sprinting, running the long races, and throwing the discus—whole pages of St. Paul's letters to the Corinthians, the Romans, the Galatians, the Philippians and to Timothy were illumined with new and fresh meaning.

When Paul called the elders of the church of Ephesus to him at Miletus, he told them that he did not hold his life of any account as dear unto him "so that I may accomplish my course" (Acts 20: 24). His "course" was the Christian race he had set himself to run. Again he says: "Know ye not that in the races of the stadium, though all run, yet but one can win the prize? So run that ye may obtain. And every man who strives in the matches trains himself by all manner of self-restraint. Yet they do it to win a fading crown—we a crown that cannot fade. I therefore run, not like the racer who is uncertain of his goal; I fight not as the pugilist who strikes out against the air; but I bruise my body and force it into bondage, lest, perchance, having called others to the contest, I should fail myself shamefully of the prize" (I. Cor. 9: 24-27, in Conybeare and Howson's vigorous translation).

Here in this brief passage are at least eight distinct references to the Isthmian games. "The stadium," such as I have already described; "the prize" that awaited the victor; the severe "training" and "self-restraint" of the contestants, which has been described very minutely by Galen and Tertullian and other secular writers; the "fading crown" made of pine leaves which still grow abundantly on the Isthmus, and which the traveler sees on every hand; the "boxing" contests of the pugilists; the actual "bruising" of his body, that he may harden and toughen it for the contest; and the herald ("having heralded" others to the contest, who summoned the racers to the stadium. The letter to the Philippians, too, contains more than one allusion to the Isthmian games. He exhorts them to faithfulness that he may not have run in vain (Phil. 2: 16), and the same exhortation is given to the Galatians (Gal. 2: 2).

In one of Paul's classic bursts of eloquence he very plainly has the contests of the stadium in mind, when he writes to the Philippians again: "Brethren, I count not myself to have laid hold thereon [the prize], but this one thing I do—forgetting that which is behind, and reaching forth to that which is before, I press towards the mark, for the prize of God's heavenly calling in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 3: 13, 14.) The words "reaching forth" in the Greek suggest the figure of a runner with body bent, stretching forward with nervous tension toward the goal. He reminds the young Timothy, his most beloved disciple, that "the wrestler does not win the crown unless he wrestles lawfully" (II. Tim. 2: 5), and Timothy would remember the stringent rules—that every candidate for the stadium must be of pure Greek descent, that he must have a good moral character, that he must be prepared to swear that he has been training for at least ten months, and that he would observe all the regulations of the games.

The most pathetic and yet triumphant of all St. Paul's allusions to the Isthmian contests was his last. He is an old man now, in a Roman dungeon, chained to a soldier, deserted by most of his friends. The cause he has championed is persecuted to the death by the hideous tyrant Nero—a cause which, after an early triumph, seemed to be losing ground—yet with exultant faith he can sing his swan song:

"I have completed the glorious contest. I have finished the course marked out for the race. Henceforth is laid up for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day" (II. Tim. 4: 7, 8). The literal translation brings out even more clearly than the Authorized or Revised Version the fact that Paul in his dying triumph still had the figure of the stadium and the races in mind, a figure which so appealed to his strenuous, eager soul.

There is very little left of the Isthmian stadium to-day. An insignificant village is near by, beside the canal. A depression that looks like a little natural valley is all that remains to remind us of the spot where the splendid arena of St. Paul's time stood.

The Aleuts, a Strange Alaskan Tribe

The Aleut Basket-Weaver's Beautiful Handiwork

Umnak, an Aleut Village in Alaska

ALASKA is a land that hitherto has been little understood. Icebergs, snow-capped mountains and frozen streams, and a sense of shivers, constitute the current opinion of this valuable northern possession. Some of the most beautiful scenery in the world has been lost sight of; wooded islands, timbered valleys, and luxuriant vegetation is a pleasant surprise to the tourist. The sun scarcely sets on Alaska in summer, and vegetation, like most industries, works overtime with amazing results. Nature not only smiles in summer but laughs aloud.

As it would not be fair to describe all the whites in Alaska as English, neither would it be fair to call all the natives Indians, though they may be cousins, or be in customs and language kindred. The fact is, they are all alike unable to hold the land, to develop its resources and to compete with the white race. They are, for the most part, now but poor, diseased, under-fed and under-clad spectators of what is happening in this northland. Filled with awe and wonder at the doings of the white race, they can but look on with sorrow, as their fish streams are taken, their game destroyed, and their future made a blank to them.

Besides the good work of the churches, the government is doing what it can to educate the native; but that is not much of an exchange for his resources. He cannot eat or keep warm on education. The whites do not need educated natives. It is all wonderful, but not of value to him. One native said, "I will teach my children to catch fish, fox, bear, and birds, and when old they will keep me; but the one taken to school left me. He cannot work. He cannot hunt. The white man says, 'He no savvy white man work and he no savvy native kind any more.'" There is more than one crude native that does not send his child to school because he sees no gain by doing so and he does see the separation of the child from him.

Fewer and fewer are the chances for the tribes or villages and smaller and smaller the opportunity to develop the resources of the land, because no provision is being made to keep any for the thirty thousand natives now living. The government is long in considering Alaska's needs, and too long in reserving a few areas for the tribes to call their own; areas where a people can perform some work that will bring them a living; where they can be an asset and not a burden.

As an illustration take the Aleut tribe. The Aleuts occupy the island peninsula of Alaska, and number about one thousand. Three hundred of them are well cared for at the seal islands; but the balance have nothing left but fish, a few fox, and the basket industry. These people occupy the most western portion of our country, being in 172 degrees east longitude, and from thence eastward to Unimak Pass, a distance of about eight hundred miles—making less than one person to the mile. The time was when they were employed to kill seal; also their tribe supplied the men that manned the sea otter boats and killed that most valuable of furs. These furs are practically a thing of the past, and the government has prohibited both the whites and the natives from killing any of them. This is not adding greatly to their troubles, for these fur animals of the sea are now so scarce as to be of little benefit to the Aleuts any more. The basket industry is now their chief support. Their baskets, though the finest in any market, bring them less than one-fourth the retail price, and provisions sell to them at about three times the cost. A woman will work two weeks to make a basket, and then get $2 for it, pay seventy-five cents for a pound of tea, twenty cents for a pound of sugar, and seven cents a pound for flour, and what for clothing? The father can get a few fish to dry, gather a few drift sticks as thrown up by the sea, as no timber is found on the islands. In winter he catches a very few blue fox, perhaps four or five, at $6 each. Curio seekers pay fabulous prices for an Aleut basket, which is, in truth, one of the best that can be had; the most artistic, the finest weave, and the most beautiful of design. One of the prettiest baskets I ever secured came from the house of a widow at the figure of $2.50; a full two weeks' work!

The word "Aleut" in the Eskimo language means "other utes," or people, and such they are, for their appearance and modes of life differ to such an extent as to warrant their being called "other people." There were two found among them whose birthplace was believed to be Kamchatka, in Asia, and it is almost certain that these people came from northern Asia. Their appearance is more of the Mongolian, and in artistic work they have much the same skill and craftsmanship as the Japanese. The Aleut is superior to the native race. He is cleaner of habit than the Eskimo and more willing to work. The tribe's ancient dwellings, now long grown over with grass, representing the age of stone implements, when excavated were found to be large roomy houses made of sod, built above the ground, and usually of more than one room. Whalebone was often used for parts of the framework. The cemetery of the community was not in a common burial ground, but in a room of the house especially constructed for that purpose. The corpses were buried in a sitting posture. Certain caves were used also as a place to bury the dead, but owing to the occurrence of skulls with fractures in them it is presumably the warriors, who died away from home, who were so buried. A few had the distinction of being stuffed with moss and made into mummies and placed in caves. These customs have long since changed, owing to the efforts of the Russian priests; and now few there are that can offer an explanation for the strange burial rooms, the cave burials and the moss-stuffed mummies.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—A COPY OF A very rare first folio of Shakespeare's plays has been discovered under curious circumstances. The sixteen-year-old son of a well-known English baronet was dabbling in the library of the Earl of Dudley, at Witley Court, when he came across what he believed to be a first folio. It has been rebound. One or two pages are missing. It was not at first thought that there was anything in the discovery. The boy, however, had seen a first folio in the British Museum, so he stuck to his guns, and eventually the book was sent to a leading London firm of book dealers, who at once agreed that it was a first folio.

—MINISTERS AS WELL as others feel the pinch of the high cost of living. A unique proposition is made by the committee appointed by the recent Methodist Episcopal Conference to consider the cost of living, as affecting pastors. In its report, it proposes the taxation of all ministerial incomes over $800 by the church, for the benefit of poor and underpaid pastors. This would go toward the Sustentation Fund, which would be further increased by the addition of collections, etc. There is no doubt that there are many pastors throughout the country having a hard struggle to live with their families on small and uncertain incomes.

—FRESH, INTERESTING discoveries were made in the newly unearthed section of the "Street of Abundance" in Pompeii a few weeks ago. An admirably preserved temple was excavated with frescoes representing all the divinities of Mount Olympus. Another equally well-preserved building was brought to light with frescoes representing sacrifices to the goddess Cybele, who was the mythical daughter of the skies and the goddess of earth. She was in mythology the wife of Saturn and the mother of Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto. The discoveries are the most remarkable made for many years, and people are flocking to see them from all parts of Italy.

—VI KYNIN WELLINGTON KOO, a talented Chinese student of Columbia University, left New York recently to return to China, where he has received the appointment of English secretary to President Yuan Shi Kai. The appointment is considered a highly important one, as Mr. Koo will take up diplomatic work in addition to secretarial duties. Columbia students in Hartley Hall, where Mr. Koo has lived for eight years, were pleased at the news of his appointment, but they were not surprised, because it has been predicted for years on the campus that he would some day occupy a high place in his native land. Mr. Koo received his A.B. degree in 1908, his A.M. in 1909, and will this year be awarded the Ph.D. degree in absentia. He has been a star debater, editor-in-chief of the Columbia Spectator, and a member of practically every campus organization. He received his early education at St. John's College, Shanghai.

—SUNDAY, APRIL 21, has been set apart as Tuberculosis Day, and the hundreds of organizations all over the country that are united in the fight against tuberculosis are urging the churches to give the day general and appropriate observance. This is the third year in which a Sunday has been thus set apart. Last year, in about fifty thousand churches, the ministers told their congregations about the practical work in which every one can have a part to lessen the fearful death-rate from the preventable and communicable disease commonly known as consumption. This year it is hoped that on the appointed day still more churches will give their powerful aid to this good cause. The purpose of Tuberculosis Day in the churches is to make the work better understood and to win for it a more general support.

—ROBERT LOVE TAYLOR, Senator from Tennessee and famous as "Fiddling Bob" Taylor, died at Providence Hospital in Washington, D. C., on March 31. The Senator had been ill for several months, and, after having been in a state of collapse for several days, he was taken to the hospital. There an operation was performed and for a time he seemed to be improving. But the following day he began to sink and at 3 o'clock next morning lapsed into final unconsciousness. Mrs. Taylor and her brother, Charles St. John, were present when he died. Mr. Taylor was sixty-two years old. He was born in Tennessee and has always lived there. He was elected to Congress first in 1878 and as a member of the Electoral College voted for Cleveland in 1884. Then after serving one year as Pension Agent at Knoxville he ran successfully for governor. It was in this campaign that he made his reputation and won his nickname by accompanying himself on a fiddle at political meetings instead of delivering a formal speech. He was re-elected governor in 1888 and again in 1896, and elected to the Senate in January, 1907. He ran again for governor in 1910, but was defeated. Mr. Taylor was one of the few men who have occupied high political positions without being politicians. In every case his election was due to his personal popularity rather than to political machinery.

—THE REPORT THAT THE treaty establishing a French protectorate over Morocco has been signed by the Sultan was confirmed on March 31 by a despatch from Fez. The treaty contains ten articles, some of which are identical with the terms of the Bardo treaty with the Bey of Tunis of 1881, which assured to France the right to occupy the positions which the French military authorities deemed necessary for the maintenance of order in Tunis. If, as the treaty just signed between the Sultan of Morocco and the French Republic indicates, the status of Morocco is to be the same as that of the other North African State of Tunis, the French "protectorate" will really be a French colony in everything but name. There is still a Bey of Tunis, Sidi Mohammed el Nasr, but few persons, even in France, have ever heard of him, and his position is purely decorative.

—FRUITLESS EFFORTS HAVE just been made by some Americans living in Germany to recover possession by purchase of one of the most important American historic treasures, the old oaken table on which the Declaration of Independence was signed. This table, or desk, has, it appears, been for many years in the hands of the Bismarck family, having been presented to Prince Bismarck by a group of German-American admirers. It is now in the Bismarck Museum at Schoenhausen, near Berlin. The title to the various objects in the museum, which contains hundreds of gifts received by the Iron Chancellor from worshipers all over the world, is now vested in Princess Herbert von Bismarck, the statesman's widowed daughter-in-law. She prizes the American souvenirs, including the Declaration of Independence table, so highly that she even refused all overtures to have them transported across the ocean in 1904 for exhibition at the St. Louis Fair.

TWO WOMEN

By Frederick Orin Bartlett

MISS MARGUERITE KERRISON stood in front of the blotchy mirror which rested on the washstand, at present also serving as her toilet table, and surveyed herself critically. By dint of much saving, chiefly on her food, by taking advantage of the inside information offered by her position behind the shirtwaist counter of a big department store, and finally by the diligent use of her nimble fingers at night when she should have been sleeping, she had succeeded in making herself look—at the absurdly low cost of seven dollars and sixty-three cents—exactly like a small black mushroom. The dark straw hat with a white pompom on the side came down over her hair and eyes and ears, thus concealing at a stroke her prettiest features. This left in view only her thin nose, mouth and sharp chin, and these tattled rather openly of the economies which had made the costume possible. She further revealed the straight narrow lines from shoulders to shoes in vogue, but it must be confessed this was not due so much to art as to nature. It was a lucky accident which had mated the prevailing style of slimness to her slim pocketbook.

Until the advent into her life of Mr. Richard Langhorne—just previous to the planning of the present costume—she had never known the meaning of luck except as a negative term. She was lucky she didn't get fired, lucky she didn't fall sick, lucky on the whole that she had no one dependent on her in this fight which was hard enough for one. Mary, of whom she rented this closet in the four-room flat, had been left with three; two gave it up before they found their legs, but one, Billy kid, was still in the ring. So Maggie kept her fingers crossed and did no complaining about even that kind of luck. But when Dick came into her life—literally by accident, for their acquaintance dated from the time he almost ran her down in the park and insisted upon taking her home in the machine to pay for the fright he gave her—she experienced the other kind of luck. This was the genuine—"the firm name upon it and the firm reputation back of it," as Thompson, the floorwalker, would say.

She examined her shoes; cut so low they were hardly more than sandals. Dick was fussy about the looks of her feet. She seized a corner of the bedquilt and polished them off once more. Then she turned to blow out her lamp. It was after seven and he would soon be at the door. She made it a point to reach the street ahead of him, for fear that in his impulsive fashion he might some day venture up the stairs. She was doing no bluffing. He knew she was only a salesgirl, but it was one thing to tell him this and another to let him see what it meant. He would probably insist more than ever upon sharing his riches with her and be more than ever indignant at her refusal. She was willing to ride with him and dine with him—though it took away her breath to see so much money go to waste—but until she had a right to more, that was all. And when she thought of the latter possibility she closed her eyes and held her breath. Though he talked so fiercely about it, she never dared any more than whisper it to herself. He had so much to give and she so little to give in return. On his side there was first of all himself; big, strong and kind. Then there was his family and all his friends—just like him, she imagined. Then there was all his wealth; she could not even dream how much. It didn't matter how much, so long as there was enough to stand always as a barrier between them and the gray wolf which down here pressed every one so hard—so terribly and insistently hard. For the sake of the little others, there must be this much; the others who might come; the others who from some sacred recess in her soul cried out for her mothering and whose cry until lately she had always answered by a frenzied look of fright around her and a determined shake of her head. Poor Denny Morrison had not understood that look when she had answered him no. Neither had one or two others who ended by thinking her vain and selfish. But they hadn't been forced to watch the losing fight of the two who went from the next room.

Against all these offerings of Dick's she had only herself. She paused for a final inspection. She smiled. It wasn't much even when all dressed up.

"Mag."

She turned quickly towards the door where a thin figure of a girl about her own age stood limply.

"What is it, Mary?" she asked anxiously.

The latter studied with admiration the model of fashion before her and grew even more apologetic in appearance if that were possible.

"It's a shame to butt in on yer at this stage of the game," she said, "but that blamed Billy kid won't close his peepers until—"

She paused, evidently too awestruck to continue.

"I'll tell him ye're gone," she concluded weakly.

"Oh, no, don't do that," answered Maggie after an instant's hesitation. "I'll be there in a jiffy."

She turned slowly around like a tailor's model.

"Well, what do you think?"

"Swell!" answered Mary enthusiastically.

"Eleven-sixty-three," Maggie confided.

"Whew! it oughter be swell fer that price!"

"It's a lot, Mary," Maggie half apologized before the other's wistful eyes, "but I took it out of myself. I didn't mind working and saving—much."

"'Course you didn't," answered Mary.

"And it's for—well, you know they like to have you look fresh and nice—if they care."

"Sure," answered Mary, though it would have been difficult for her to explain what experience gave her the right to speak so authoritatively.

"Now for Billy!" concluded Maggie.

"Say, he'll git yer all messed up. Better let me tell him—" the mother began, but the girl only laughed.

"You can't fool Billy—and you know it! Besides, I want to. So come on!"

The small boy in question was standing up on the lounge, dressed in a calico shirt that barely reached his knees. With his big brown eyes wide open, he certainly looked wise enough to justify Maggie's assertion. As far as speech went, however, his intelligence had to be left a matter for conjecture. His vocabulary consisted of a variety of gutturals through the medium of which he expressed two brief statements, "I will" and "I won't." Maggie hurried to his side. His thin arms immediately encircled her neck, while with the mystical assertion of "Oogly—oogly—oo," he clawed for the pompon on the side of her hat.

"You see!" exclaimed Maggie, "he says, 'Don't you try to fool me. I know a thing or two.'"

She buried her lips in the hollow of his neck.

"He'll paw yer all to pieces," protested Mary. "Cut it out, Bill."

Bill squirmed, with excited chuckling, into a position for a second attack upon the pompon. Maggie held him at arm's length, and, with eyes grown lustrous and wistfully warm, watched him kick frantically at nothing.

"You darling!" she exclaimed, "you're worth all the hats in the world."

From the street below there came the chug of an automobile. Maggie turned her head in that direction.

"There's yer fren'," Mary warned her.

With another kiss on the boy's neck, with half a dozen on his tangled hair, with a final one on his tender lips, Maggie reluctantly gave him back. She placed her hands on her friend's drooping shoulders.

"Mary," she whispered excitedly, "if it comes true, it'll be for all of us!"

She ran back to her room to readjust her hat, which had assumed a decidedly rakish angle. She was trying with excited fingers to put it into place when she heard a knock at her door. It took away her breath. She looked about for some way of escape when the knock was repeated. Stealing to the door, she whispered through the panels:

"Dick! Go away. I'll be down in a minute."

The voice which answered her was not Dick's, though it was marvelously like Dick's for a woman's voice.

"Is this Miss Kerrison?"

Falling back a step, Maggie stared at the dull wood. Then timidly, fearfully she swung open the door. A very tall woman with veiled face stood before her. The stranger held herself as rigidly as though she were made of wood.

"If this is Miss Kerrison, I wish to see you," the woman impatiently broke the silence.

"Come in," said Maggie uneasily.

With a rustle of silk the woman swept in, while Maggie looked on as though at a play.

"Perhaps you had better close the door," suggested the woman in a voice that chilled like an undertaker's.

Maggie obeyed. The stranger gave one swift glance about the room and then faced the girl. She spoke with marked effort and even more marked disgust.

"You—you expected Dick up here in your apartments?"

Apartments was a big word for so tiny a nest. Even Maggie caught the incongruity, and under any other circumstances would have smiled.

The mere inclination to smile relieved the situation a little.

"No," she answered directly, "I didn't."

The stranger waved her hand in protest.

"It is no use to tell me falsehoods," she cut in. "I know the whole miserable story."

TWO WOMEN

"I don't know what you know," Maggie answered with quick dignity. "But I wasn't expectin' Dick up here, and that's what scared me."

"Oh?"

"I was afraid he might come in spite of me," she added.

The stranger turned aside. She didn't relish the implication she herself drew. For a moment she was silent. Then she began again as a disagreeable duty:

"My son—"

Maggie checked her with a quick start.

"You are Dick's mother?" she asked in breathless awe.

"Mr. Langhorne is my son," the woman admitted coldly.

Maggie leaned towards her as though trying to pierce the black veil. She had dreamed of that face which was hidden there. She ached for a glimpse of it.

"Dick's mother!" she repeated with reverence.

Mrs. Langhorne lost her temper—a most undignified thing to do. There wasn't a woman in her set who could have worried her into doing this.

"I forbid you to speak of me and of my son in that intimate way. What right have you? Bah, I can't even discuss it! Sit down, won't you?"

Maggie seated herself on the edge of the bed. She was sure that her hat had worked over to one side.

"I—I want to dispose of this matter as soon as possible," Mrs. Langhorne continued. "My son was unavoidably called away."

The trace of sarcasm in her voice was lost on the girl. The latter reached up and resolutely removed her hat.

"He left a note for you," Mrs. Langhorne concluded. Maggie eagerly reached out her hand for it.

"He left it with the chauffeur and I tore it up," Mrs. Langhorne informed her with decided relish.

Quite unconsciously Maggie clenched her fists. She scowled at the black veil.

"Why did you do that?" she demanded sharply.

Mrs. Langhorne did not answer. At first sight of the black mushroom, she had been absolutely at a loss to account for even a passing infatuation on the part of her son. However defective his tastes, he was a fairly good judge of feminine beauty. Now as Maggie's eyes gained their brilliancy, as her keen, earnest face stood revealed, Mrs. Langhorne caught an expression that held her for a moment. There was a trace of something there which distinguished the otherwise rather ordinary features.

"Why did you do that?" insisted Maggie, resenting this coolly critical stare.

"For the same reason I came down here—to protect my son," she answered deliberately.

"To protect—"

"My son."

Maggie caught her breath at the repeated word. As spoken by Mrs. Langhorne it was a big, majestic word. Somehow it expressed neither Dick nor the mother of Dick. It quite overawed her. She turned her eyes to her new shoes and waited.

"I don't want to mince matters with you," Mrs. Langhorne resumed. "I want to be frank—in order to expedite this business."

She fumbled at the gold net back by her side and drew out a thin narrow book and a fountain pen. She watched the girl shrewdly, while the latter watched her merely curiously.

"How much will you take never to see Mr. Langhorne again?"

It sounded a coarse, brutal question even to her who spoke it. Still she didn't expect to see the girl turn white so suddenly. With a sudden sense of shame, she covered the check book with her hand.

Maggie had risen to her feet with an expression of dumb terror.

"You—do you honestly think I'm like that?" she stammered.

"I haven't thought much about it," answered Mrs. Langhorne weakly. "I don't want to think about it. I simply wish to close the incident and give you what recompense I can. And this—"

She held out the check book. The girl covered her eyes with her hands as though to shut out the sight.

"Don't get hysterical," pleaded Mrs. Langhorne.

She was glad of her veil. She had expected a scene, but not this sort. She felt like a slave dealer.

Maggie sprang toward her like a cub tigress.

"If it was any one but you," she cried, "I'd—I'd pay you for that! I'm not like that—and he knows it! I wish I could hurt you for coming here and—"

She stopped helplessly. After all this was Dick's mother—this was Dick's mother. With the terrible disillusionment, her voice broke and she began to sob.

"Will you—will you just go before I—I forget?" she choked.

Mrs. Langhorne was a woman of quick instincts. She was also a resourceful fighter. She instantly withdrew from her present unfavorable position.

"I apologize," she said quickly, putting back her veil, and looking the girl frankly in the face.

Maggie found herself gazing into eyes that were not unlike Dick's after all. The large nose and mouth were like his, too. She couldn't understand how it was possible, but she saw enough to dispel her suspicions. She couldn't but believe any one who looked so much like Dick. She turned away without a word.

"You forgive me—enough to let me talk to you a little?" asked Mrs. Langhorne in a gentler voice.

Maggie reseated herself on the edge of the bed.

"Go on," she answered dully.

"It's hard," Mrs. Langhorne resumed, "hard for both of us. But it would be still harder for us both if we allowed this to go on. You must give me credit at least for being older and wiser than you."

She paused.

"It seems difficult for me to say anything without appearing brutal," she admitted, "and yet that isn't what I wish. I wish to be fair—fair and clear. Let me ask you a question; you think you—you love Mr. Langhorne?"

"Think?" demanded Maggie, throwing up her head.

With a touch of crimson on her cheeks, Mrs. Langhorne nodded quickly.

"Very well—we'll admit that. But it makes it all the harder for you; all the harder for me. You see now only the rosy side—the big house, the automobiles, the fine clothes."

Maggie straightened up in her new dress. She was glad she had it on.

"Heaven knows I don't begrudge you those things," continued the mother. "As far as that goes, I'm willing to share with you within reason what I myself have. I'm willing—"

Her hand fell significantly to the check book again.

"Without Dick?" Maggie challenged her.

"Of course," answered Mrs. Langhorne, growing impatient.

Maggie's lips grew tense.

"Without him you could have those luxuries all to yourself," Mrs. Langhorne hastened to explain. "With him—you'd have to share them with his friends. And these friends would be merciless to you; cruel to you. They'd spoil every day of your life. They'd humiliate and shame you."

"Me?"

"I'll be frank; they'd turn into bitter every sweet you crave."

"Could they do that to me?" Maggie said half aloud.

"To you?"

Maggie smiled. It wasn't a pleasant smile; it was more of a fierce challenge.

"Let them try it," she burst out angrily. "What do I care about them? He's all the friend I want. Dick's all the friend I want."

Mrs. Langhorne studied her helplessly. The strange part of it was she had an uneasy feeling that the girl spoke the truth—that she would hold herself so far outside the pale that no one could reach her. Mrs. Langhorne could not yet explain this conviction. She merely sensed it. She herself had not penetrated very far beyond the magic circle which seemed to surround this strange creature. There was a peculiar quality of independence and sincerity here for which she could not account. It sprang from some source which she had not yet reached. She played her last card.

"What about Dick?"

"What about him?" Maggie demanded.

"Do you wish to make him sacrifice his family, all his friends? Do you wish to make him a social outcast?"

The girl winced.

"You say you love him; do you wish to do anything to hurt him?" added Mrs. Langhorne, pressing home her point.

Maggie met the gray eyes.

"I'd see myself dead and buried before I'd let harm come to Dick," she said quietly.

Mrs. Langhorne picked up courage.

"Then surely—"

"There isn't anything I wouldn't do for Dick," Maggie broke in, rising again to her feet, "but you don't know what Dick and I want—you don't understand!"

"I—"

Maggie cut her short.

"I'm going to have my say now, and I'll talk honestly to you, Mrs. Langhorne, because you're Dick's mother. You're right, I'd love a big house and pretty clothes. You couldn't live here all your life and not want them! But I wouldn't marry a man to get them—not for myself. I can worry along. And you're right, I want money. I wouldn't marry Dick if he didn't have it, any more than I'd marry Denny Morrison. I wouldn't, no matter how much I loved him, because," her voice sank, "it isn't right to the others."

"What others?" demanded Mrs. Langhorne in astonishment.

The girl lowered her eyes. When she replied, it was very gently:

"The ones like—like Billy here."

A wail came from the next room, as though the boy had answered to his name.

"Wait!" exclaimed Maggie.

She hurried out, and in a few seconds came back with Billy wrapped in a soiled and torn blanket. The lad clung to her neck and blinked in wonder at the stranger.

"Here he is!" exclaimed Maggie. "He's had a tough fight, but he's winning. Aren't you, Billy?"

She cuddled the boy to her breast.

"It's for the children—if God was good to Dick and me—that we'd want the money," she said simply, "and because of them I guess we wouldn't mind much what people said or did. That's why."

Mrs. Langhorne had difficulty in breathing. There was a big lump in her throat. This problem was growing complicated. She stepped nearer to look at the child.

"He's a relative of yours?" she asked.

Maggie shook her head. The boy reached up and seized Mrs. Langhorne's gloved finger. Maggie drew him away.

"Don't do that," pleaded Mrs. Langhorne, "let me take him a moment."

Soiled blanket and all, she held him, staring at the ill-nourished face until her eyes grew misty. Then she gave

The simplest Gown looks well on a Figure of Correct Proportion if Carried Well.

You Can Weigh Exactly what You Should Weigh

My pupils are among the most refined intellectual women of America. They have regained health and good figures and learned how to keep well. Each has given me a few minutes a day in the privacy of her own room to following scientific, hygienic principles of health, prescribed to suit each individual's needs.

No Drugs—No Medicine

My work has grown in favor because results are quick, natural and permanent and because they are scientific and appeal to common sense.

Be well—nothing short of well.

Radiate Health—so that every one with whom you come in contact is permeated with your strong spirit, your wholesome personality—feels better in body and mind for your very presence.

Be Attractive—well groomed.

Improve Your Figure—in other words be at your best. You wield a stronger influence for good, for education, for wholesome right living, if you are attractive and well, graceful and well poised—upright in body as well as in mind and you are happier.

I want to help every woman to realize that her health lies, to a degree, in her own hands, and that she can reach her ideal in figure and poise.

Judge what I can do for you by what I have done for others.

I think I do not exaggerate when I say I have corrected more

Chronic Ailments and built up and reduced more women during the past nine years than any physician—the best physicians are my friends—their wives and daughters are my pupils.

I have

Reduced about 25,000 women from 10 to 85 lbs. have rounded out and

Increased the Weight of as many more—all through strengthening nerves, heart, circulation, lungs and vital organs so as to regulate the assimilation of food.

Won't you join us—we will make you and the world better.

I have published a free booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly, and giving other information of vital interest to women. Write for it and I will also tell you about my work. If you are perfectly well and your figure is just what you wish, you may be able to help a dear friend—at least you will help me by your interest in this great movement of health and figure through natural means.

Sit down and write to me NOW.
Don't wait—you may forget it.

I have had a wonderful experience, and I should like to tell you about it.

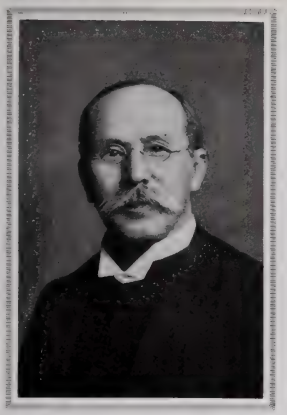
Bishop Honda of Japan



The Late Bishop Yoichi Honda

THE earthly kingdom of Christ has suffered a great loss in the death of Bishop Yoichi Honda of Japan. In 1907 the missionary stations of Japan connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church of America were separated from the American body and formed into an independent national church. Dr. Honda was created a bishop and became the head of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Japan. He had long held a commanding position among the Christian forces of that country, was influential as an educator as well as a clergyman, was known and admired in Europe and America, and was, at the time of his election to the episcopacy, president of the Christian College at Tokyo.

A long forward step was taken in missionary conquest when this new national church was created and a native worker was elevated to its head. Bishop Honda was influential not only among members of his own denomination and other Christians, but had a wide and powerful influence in other circles. The recent Conference of Religions held in Tokyo, at which representatives of Shintoism, Buddhism and Christianity were present, appointed a committee of three men to carry the work of the conference further; Bishop Honda was the Christian representative of this committee, and was made its chairman.

His loss will be felt by the whole nation of Japan, a nation now progressing with rapid strides toward a modern civilization, and which has produced already men who were really great. Bishop Honda died at Nagasaki, on March 26, of typhoid fever, in the sixty-fourth year of his age.

him back to Maggie's eager arms and sat down weakly. She gazed at the girl as she might at a Madonna. Recalling the words she had spoken a little while ago, she turned scarlet. She felt as though she had committed a sacrilege.

And yet the problem which had dragged her down here still remained. But when she took it up again she found herself looking at it from a new angle. She had come here as the jealous, narrow mother of her son, and now, with that Madonna in front of her, she was forced to recognize a sacred kinship, demanding a still higher loyalty. This girl, with yearnings as yet only half understood, half expressed, was fighting for instincts which were the heritage of their common sex, and which called for broad justice. This involved a consideration of the other side of the question: was her son big enough to live up to the obligations of the clear white duty this girl would thrust upon him? It was a humiliating point for the mother to raise, but she did not flinch from it.

The boy was impulsively generous at times, but the very impulse which now prompted him to defy his own for this alliance might in the end prompt him to cast it off. She feared that the dramatic charm, which for the moment made the episode romantic to the boy, would not be sustained. There was nothing vital back of it in him, such as inspired this girl. It was a pity there was not. Such an inspiration rose above caste; rose above blood. But she admitted the truth, bitterly admitted it. In the end, this Madonna might be a sacrifice. The gold, which to Maggie bespoke only protection, was to Dick a lure which threatened his destruction. It furnished him not the opportunities for fatherhood, but the opportunities for spurning it.

Billy, feeling himself to be in safe company, had gone to sleep. Mrs. Langhorne crossed to Maggie's side. She placed her hand upon the girl's shoulder, and spoke in a low, earnest voice.

"This is the naked truth," she confessed; "my son—my son is not good enough for you."

Maggie looked up and smiled gently.

"I mean it," insisted Mrs. Langhorne, though the words burned her throat.

Maggie still smiled. With her head thrown back a little, her eyes, with their deep light, meeting the eyes of gray grown infinitely tender (like Dick's at their best), she smiled, softly patting the little warm figure in her arms.

"Don't let Dick take you away from your own," pleaded Mrs. Langhorne. "I know it will be hard; for a little while it will be hard for you, but the other way there are dangers you don't even suspect. I'm telling you what I've learned myself. The lack of money can't do the harm to the others that money itself can. Stay here. Stay here with Billy."

"I love him," answered Maggie, "but he isn't my own."

"You'll find your own—down here," insisted Mrs. Langhorne, "and when found, they'll be all your very own."

"My own would be my own wherever I was," answered Maggie, "but they don't stay long down here. Two—like him—have gone already. You'd better let them stay unborn than go like that."

Mrs. Langhorne drew a deep breath. She knew nothing of this. Dick was the only one she had ever had. And now Dick was the only one through whom she could look for others. If this little girl with the wonderful eyes could—if she could bring others to her! If she could inspire in Dick what she had inspired in a very worldly wise old woman—a feeling that nothing counted against the holy Madonna instinct! Decent surroundings and training could do much to offset what was now lacking in blood. As for Dick's friends, her own friends—what would they matter if Maggie could hold the boy straight? It was the sort of thing Dick's father might have sanctioned had he lived. The miracle was that she herself should now consider it as a possibility.

"Maggie," she said, and hesitated. "May I call you Maggie?"

"Yes," answered the girl.

"Maggie, I've said all I can—all I can."

"I'm sorry," said Maggie.

"Everything except—God bless you."

"You mean—" cried Maggie.

Mrs. Langhorne wearily passed her hand over her eyes.

"That I shall pray God to bless you—both," she said.

THE OUTDOOR WOMAN

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

How Does Your Garden Grow?

THE joy of the garden is perennial. Eve set the fashion of working in the garden before she left the bowers of Eden. No doubt after she had stepped outside its realm of peace and beauty, she found real solace for her woe in helping Adam in his task of subduing the ground and compelling it to yield food for sustenance and grain for harvesting. Eve's housekeeping in that far-off day was a simple thing compared with the complex home living of her daughters. She must have been to the very end of her days that great first mother of the race, an outdoor woman, and one may be sure that she never ceased to be happy in her garden. In the springtime of the year the question we may ask one another is: How does your garden grow? If you have only the narrow borders that surround a city grass plot or only a little window garden, you may still have the pleasure of seeing green things start up from the soil, and before your eyes Nature will repeat her amazing miracles as remarkable in their swiftness and efflorescence in the little space as in the large. If you live in the country, you may have a vegetable garden that shall furnish you with succulent edibles for the table and a strawberry bed in which you shall revel with pride and delight. You may raise berries and gather ripe fruits and walk through your own orchard, but the real, overflowing, never-ceasing and daily renewed bliss that shall be your portion you will find in a garden of flowers.

Judge Mabel Van Dyke Bell

JUDGE BELL, the new Federal commissioner at Covington, Ky., is the only woman judge in the United States. She made history when on January 25 last she held her first court for Uncle Sam, for it was the first time a woman judge ever held court in the United States. Judge Bell is married and has two children attending a public school in Covington. She has been in the Federal service for a number of years, but only recently was she made judge in a Federal court.

The wise woman depends more upon hardy perennials than upon the plants that are only for the season, although she will take pains to have both. In the spading of the soil and its enrichment with fertilizers she must call upon the friendly help of husband, brother or hired man, but the woman who loves a garden for its own sake is independent of assistance after the roughest work is done. Among the hardy plants that never fail in repaying our labor with bloom and fragrance, lilacs and lilies are pre-eminent in the foreground. The plumes of the lilac, white or purple and sweet as honey, carry us in thought to our grandmothers' gardens. There are rambler roses that year after year climb to the roof of the veranda, their myrrad flowers greeting the eye of the beholder with splendid color, while their rapid growth is like that of Jonah's gourd.

A bed of lilies of the valley and a bed of pansies is each an unspeakable delight. The woman who has a garden prizes her flowers for the beauty that belongs to them, for the pleasure they give her and for the messages they may carry to sick rooms, to little children and distant friends. Sometimes she succeeds in cultivating a wild garden, but it is the exceptional woman who can coax the flowers of the forest to make themselves at home in the garden beside her door. They seem exiled when torn from their natural habitat. They thrive best under the fostering care of Mother Nature, and are short-lived when another hand than hers undertakes their care.

The Vagrant Mood

YOU cannot play tennis after you are fifty, although you may play croquet and acquit yourself uncommonly well. The day of running a race and the day of violent exercise ends with women with the passing of youth. That particular period comes to some earlier and to others later than a time indicated by a particular milestone, but it is perfectly safe to say that the frankly middleaged woman is more dignified, more comfortable and, on the whole, more in keeping with the laws of health if she then ceases to rush about and begins to take life tranquilly. The vagrant mood that comes in April and May is as familiar to the active elderly woman as to her juniors. No woman who has maintained her health and poise at the high level that should be woman's birthright need cease to live out of doors because she has gone a little beyond her noon-day. Walking and tramping and picnicking and looking for wild flowers and carrying home in triumph great branches of dogwood and pink sheaves of mountain laurel are as easily within reach of the woman who is growing old as of the girl in her teens. The outdoor woman may wave a defiant challenge in the face of Time. Just as a woman is beautiful in her early unfolding, she may be gracious and fascinating and regal in the beauty of her later days. She will miss all that she ought to have in that department labeled Good Looks, if she spend all her time bending over sewing or baking over a fire.

When the vagrant mood gets possession of one, she ought resolutely to drop indoor work, simplify the preparation of meals, postpone the housecleaning until a more convenient season and set off on an outdoor tramp. If she cannot go farther than the nearest field or stream, let her take her book or her work with her and yield herself up to sunshine and loafing. Headaches, indigestion and melancholy, the demons whose variety is legion, are easily routed when one yields to the vagrant mood. As often as the spring days come Stevenson's exquisite lyric voices for us the sentiment of the vagrant mood:

For who would gravely set his face
To go to this or t'other place?
There's nothing under heaven so blue
That's rarely worth the traveling to.

On every hand the roads begin,
And people walk with zeal therein;
But wheresoe'er the highways tend,
Be sure there's nothing at the end.

Then follow you, wherever hie
The traveling mountains of the sky,
Or let the streams in exile mode
Direct your choice upon a road.

For one and all, or high or low,
Will lead you where you wish to go;
And one and all go night and day
Over the hills and far away.

THE OUTDOOR WOMAN

The Care of Clothing

CAREFUL mothers are usually by way of insisting that there shall be a broad line of demarcation between best and second-best and everyday clothing. The best gown, the nicest hat and the prettiest suit if worn to church or lecture or musical are to be taken off and replaced by something less new and fine. This at least used to be the dictate of the home ruler in simpler days than ours. "Every day is a raw makes Sunday a daw" was a proverb often on the lips of an old-fashioned grandmother. Another lady who had arrived at her ninetieth year with the tradition of her youth unshimmed, gazed with actual horror into the heedless girl. "My dear," she exclaimed, "do you keep your gloves thrown around in heaps, and have you never been taught to fold your laces and ribbons? In my day we took care of our clothes." The truth is that the woman who aspires to be well dressed will consult economy and achieve distinction by following out the counsels and suggestions of these good grandmothers. Gloves should be sent to the cleaner before they reach a stage where their rejuvenation is almost impossible. They should, too, be kept in boxes of their own, or in silk cases made for the purpose of preserving them from dust and soil. When removed from the hand the fingers should be pulled out and the gloves made to resemble new ones as yet unworn. We all know that it is not a bad thing to let a gown or wrap go into occasional retirement. When one has grown a bit discouraged over a garment, seeing its defects, regretting that it is somewhat out of fashion, and positively disliking the way she looks in it, she should, if possible, hang it up for a while in the darkest corner of her closet. Weeks later, she may put it on again and it will seem to have renewed its youth and beauty.

The young girl who comes in, and, having assumed an apron, takes up her share of the household duties, may be certain that her spring suit will look shabby long before the season is over. In the one detail of shoes alone, the woman who keeps her outdoor and indoor footgear for the times and seasons to which it belongs will be better shod, as well as much more comfortable, than her friend who insists on wearing a single pair of shoes all day.

The best-dressed woman is not necessarily the one who spends the most money. Time, thought and taste tell to the advantage of dress. Those who persist in speaking of carelessness in dress as if it were a merit are greatly mistaken. To be pleasingly, though, far better, not elaborately dressed, and as attractive as she may be, is every woman's duty, and the dress that suits the occasion confers dignity upon the wearer. "Why do you wear a pretty bow in your hair, and take so much pains to have a becoming tie?" some one asked the teacher of a large class in the public school. "I wear my ribbons and put on my bows and make myself attractive because I have to influence for good fifty boys every day," was the reply. The teacher was right. Her boys believed in her much more than they would had she been a dowdy.

THE LORD'S PORTION

MANY letters are received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from its readers concerning tithes, Christian giving, the "Lord's portion," etc. We are glad to be able to set before them today the views of so distinguished an authority as Professor David Smith, D.D., LL.D., who in every essential point expresses the same views that have appeared from time to time on this subject in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We take the following extract from his article in the British Weekly:

"An income without God's portion is like a week without a Sabbath or a town without a church. It is characteristic of the two dispensations that, whereas the Law required a tenth, there is no assessment under the Gospel. Christianity is the religion of the Spirit, and never deals with men in the way of commands and prohibitions. It puts the love of Christ in our hearts, and 'the love of Christ constraineth us.' It calls us sons of God, and puts us on our honor to be worthy of that high kinship. 'Freely,' says Jesus, 'ye have received, freely give.'

"The trouble is that it is difficult where there is no prescription to determine how much one ought to give, and to be assured that one is giving enough; and it seems to me that there are two practical and effective tests. There is no true liberality where there is no sacrifice, no self-denial; where one's contribution is made 'of one's superfluity' (Mark 12: 44, R. V.), that is, of the surplus which remains over after one's own wants are supplied. Shall I 'offer burnt offerings unto the Lord my God of that which doth cost me nothing?' Thus the measure of our liberality is not what we give, but what we retain. It is difficult for a rich man to be liberal. He must give so much in order that he may miss what he gives, in order that it may cost him a sacrifice and involve self-denial.

"What proportion does our Christian liberality bear to our expenditure on luxuries? A wealthy friend once told me how this consideration first came home to him and led him to revise his scale of giving. It was at the outset of his successful career, when he was earning a good salary. His lifelong hobby was a well-bred dog; and, looking over his cash book one day, he remarked two adjacent entries. One was 'To Foreign Missions, 60 cents,' and the other, 'To terrier pup, $26.' There was no harm whatever in the latter entry; it was perfectly legitimate. The harm lay in its disproportion to the former. A man who could afford so much for a toy could afford more for the conversion of the heathen. It is perhaps less unfortunate than it seems that religion should be so mixed up with money. Money is a test not only of a gentleman but of a Christian; and the fact is that most of us stand the test wonderfully well, far better than we think.

"In justice to ourselves we ought to define more accurately that phrase, 'giving to the Lord.' It comprehends not merely what we cast into the temple treasury, but all that we bestow on others for love or pity's sake. Is it not written that 'he that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord'? It is not only our contributions toward the support of the ministry and the evangelization of the heathen that are 'given to the Lord,' but all our public and private charities; and if everything be fairly reckoned, it will be found that it is not a mere tenth of their incomes that some of us are giving, but a far larger proportion."

The Art Covers Give Great Pleasure

Was it by inspiration that you conceived the idea of these glorious Art Covers? I always feast my eyes on them for a while before turning a leaf. You cannot know what pleasure these gems bring into the lives of country housewives, to whom the great art galleries must be forever closed. These masterpieces carry more culture into the household than volumes about esthetic development.

Prof. Anderson's Finality in Food

The Result of Seven Years' Work

These delightful foods—Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice—hold a unique position.

Here alone are the millions of food granules literally blasted to pieces.

Whole grains are made wholly digestible. That has for decades been the ultimate aim of scientists in food.

The Costly Process

To accomplish this purpose the grains are sealed up in bronze-steel guns. Then the guns are revolved for sixty minutes in a heat of 550 degrees.

Every atom of moisture within the grain is changed to super-heated steam. When the guns are unsealed that steam explodes. The granules of grain are blasted to pieces, so digestion can instantly act. It begins before the grains reach the stomach.

Your physician knows what this means.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c Except in Extreme West

The explosion does this in addition:

The grains are puffed to eight times normal size—made four times as porous as bread.

A myriad cells are created, each surrounded by toasted walls, so the crisp grains melt in the mouth.

The terrific heat has given the grains the flavor of toasted nuts. And the grains become the most delightful foods ever served on the morning table.

How Millions of Dishes Are Being Served

Folks who know Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice now consume 22,000,000 dishes monthly.

Some serve them with cream and sugar. Some mix them with fruit, to give a nut-like blend.

Some serve like crackers in a bowl of milk. That's the ideal bedtime dish.

Boys eat them dry, like peanuts. Girls use them in candy making. Cooks use them in frosting cake.

These countless people are all happier and healthier because these foods were invented.

Have you found them out?

What's the Matter With a Fountain Pen When It Leaks

We will explain:

When you set an ordinary fountain pen in your pocket, all the ink doesn't run to the bottom. Some always stays up in the little, straight feed tube leading to pen point.

When the pen gets warm from your body heat—98 degrees—the air that is always in a pen barrel, expands. It expands up through the feed tube, forcing the ink up and out on the end of the pen. So, when you remove cap to write, you get smeared.

Now, the Parker Pen does not leak, because there is No Ink In The Feed Tube.

You see the Parker feed tube is curved,—the Lucky Curve. The curved end touches the barrel wall. This touch causes Capillary Attraction, which sucks all ink out of the feed tube the instant pen is turned upright. Thus it is empty when the warm air ascends.

Parker Pens never hitch, skip or blot, because pens are 14k gold, tipped with polished Iridium; Spear Head Ink Controller keeps ink from flowing too fast or slow.

Standard style Parker Lucky Curve Pens $1.50 to $250.00, according to size and ornamentation.

New Parker Jack Knife Safety Pen

Sense and Nonsense

Conducted by JOSIAH ALLEN'S WIFE

A Talk About War

Marietta Holley
Author of Samantha at Coney Island

SEZ Samantha to Josiah the other day: "I should think the nations would be ashamed to cling to that most barbarous custom of barbarism, the most cruel and awful, the most costly and senseless. Why, you would punish school children if they tried to settle their quarrels by a fight; you would make 'em leave it to the teacher and trustees to settle. And children ort to grow better and wiser as they grow older, and not more evil and foolish."

Sez Josiah, "Wimmen don't understand these great matters, Samantha. Their brains hain't big enough, or hard enough."

"I wonder, Josiah, if any one can understand the wisdom of warfare that turns human bein's into wild beasts of prey. Mercy, pity and goodness all trod down under the feet of the great armies! And think of the more ghastly army of pestilence, crime and want that foller after—a phantom host shadowin' and blackenin' the land, mightier for woe and evil than the army they foller. Why, I couldn't tell you the horrors of war, if I should talk for hundreds of years."

"I don't want to hear you talk that length of time, Samantha, anyway. I git considerable tired now when you talk stiddy without stoppin' for only a week or two."

"But," I sez in solemn axents, "it couldn't be told by mortal tongues, Josiah. It is a language writ in broken hearts, despair, madness, want, crime and death."

"But what would you do, Samantha, if another nation imposed upon you?"

"As I said, Josiah, you wouldn't let school children dash out in their first hot anger and kill and maim each other; you'd make 'em leave their quarrels to wiser and cooler heads to settle. And in peaceful times, you wouldn't let 'em spend all their money for shot guns and rifles and struttin' round before each other so heavy weighted with fightin' stock they couldn't hardly waddle."

"Oh, pshaw! that's entirely different."

"I d'no as it is; the nations are staggerin' under the weight of their armies and navies, spendin' most of their incomes in preparations for war—warships, war pensions, etc.—and tryin' to outdo each other in murderous weepons. You'd put a stop to it, if it wuz children's doin's."

"Oh, blame it onto me if you want to, but I overlook it in you bein' a female, Samantha. They can't understand, none on 'em, how a man's or a nation's honor can't be infringed on without speedy punishment."

"So the duelists used to say, but that is done away with."

"Fightin' begun in the Garden of Eden. War always has been and always will be," Josiah persisted.

"So the slaveholders used to say, but slavery passed away."

"Oh, keep on arguin' and arguin', and comparin' us nations and men to deestrict school children."

"Josiah, we are all on us only poor ignorant school children, sot down here on the hard bench of life, to learn our lessons and try to git 'em perfect enough to be promoted into a higher class. And the great Master of our world school told his pupils to love their enemies, and do good to them that injured 'em."

"That is good talk, Samantha; but I ask you agin, would you scrooch down and be stole from and imposed upon?"

"Enough money is spent on war and preparations for it and its ghastly effects, to educate and convert the world to the beautiful knowledge of love and peace. Folks are beginnin' to realize it, the noble Peace Commission—"

"The Peace Commission," snorted Josiah, "hain't managed right. They hadn't ort to start for peace meetin's in new warships and their pockets full of stuns."

Sez I, "Let good smart men, chosen by the people, arbitrate and—"

"A good smart man!" interrupted Josiah. "I know what you're hintin' at. You'd like to put it onto me; but I tell you I can't tend to it with all the rest of my work."

And rememberin' his barn chores, he started out in haste.

Among the Workers

—A GREAT NUMBER OF converts, most of them men, are reported from the great union campaign conducted by evangelists Hart and Magann at Homestead, Pa. A large tabernacle was built for the meetings, in which all the Protestant churches of the city united. Many workmen from the Carnegie steel works were among the converts, and numbers of them started their Christian life well by working to bring their companions to Christ. The evangelists began another union campaign on March 17 at St. Joseph, Mo.

—DR. JOHN H. ELLIOTT and his associate, Mr. Albert S. Reitz, recently closed a union evangelistic mission in the city of Norristown, Pa. Fifteen churches and the Y. M. C. A. united with the movement. A deep, abiding work was done in the quickening of the church life, and in the reclaiming of many outside the church. Pastors and people alike expressed their delight in the way the campaign was conducted. From March 7 to March 24, Dr. Elliott and Mr. Reitz were in Hempstead, N. Y., with the united churches. From there they went to Knoxville, Tenn., for a week's work with the Men and Religion Forward Movement. Their next campaign is at Danville, Ky.

—THE BREAD-LINE instituted by the Gospel Mission in Washington, D. C., two years ago has proved a great blessing to the poor of that city. A "penny lunch" has been established by the mission where newsboys, messengers, and men hard up or out of work can get a satisfying meal, every item of which costs but one cent; a cent for coffee, a cent for bread or roll, a cent for a bowl of soup, a cent for a plate of baked beans and pork. The mission also conducts a kindling wood business, a free dispensary, and during the severe weather provided shelter for homeless women and children. Definite spiritual work is carried on, and the claims of the Gospel earnestly presented. Future plans for the mission include the establishment of a Bible school and a market where the poor may buy food at low cost.

—REV. AND MRS. JOHN MOE, missionaries at Nankuantao, in Shantung Province, North China, have been in this country on furlough and are about to return to their work. They have been visiting their parents and friends in Decatur, Ill. Mrs. Sue M. Hagaman, of that city, is organizing a group to equip and support a hospital in connection with Mr. Moe's work. Mrs. Hagaman has already been one of the prime movers in establishing a large hospital at Decatur and is moved by the account of the need on the foreign field to undertake this new work. Mr. and Mrs. Moe are located where the suffering and want of the Chinese people are distressingly evident. Their work has been greatly blessed, and they are hoping to establish in connection with it not only a hospital but a training school as well.

—MR. W. L. C. BREY, of Chicago, writes: "In sending check for $2 to renew your valuable paper, I enclose an item from our Sunday School paper which may interest your readers, showing what the Lord has done at a meeting for the recruits of the United States army. A decision card was used, and a circular letter was given to the boys who signed the card. Now we have four services every week at Jefferson Barracks, eleven miles south of St. Louis. There is a class for Bible study. The writer obtained permission from the military authorities in Jefferson Barracks, and later from the War Department, to begin religious services—and with God's guidance and blessing, and the co-operation of the pastors and laymen of St. Louis, we have been enabled to maintain the work to date." The published accounts show that the meetings have been attended with excellent spiritual results.

Spreads a wide or narrow strip—thin, even—quickly

The metal spreader that you get in the carton along with the air-tight, screw-cap bottle of

is the neatest little contrivance for applying glue ever devised. You can spread a wide strip, as shown in the picture, or a narrow one, by using the end of the spreader. Besides, you can get the thin blade into crevices where a brush—clumsy and sticky—would never go.

There's no waste either—you don't leave more on the spreader than you used in your work. Nor can the glue dry out under the air-tight screw cap. 10c. everywhere.

Helping China's Orphans

SEVERAL of our missionaries in China have sent letters to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, expressing a warm and appreciative interest in the effort that is now being made to provide for the support of the famine orphans at the various missions. These letters make it clear that the good missionaries have had to face many hardships recently, and that their lot has been particularly trying one for many months past, owing to the war and the rise of all kinds of provisions to famine prices. "We are living in hopes that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will still be able to help us to provide for our little girls," writes a missionary at Hangchow, "for it would be a very hard task to turn any of them off." This same feeling is expressed in all the letters. We trust that our readers who have not already done so will try to help these faithful missionaries to provide for these little ones by sending in their contributions to our Chinese Famine Orphan Fund. Acknowledgments of the contributions to the Fund received during the last week are printed below:

Called Higher

Charles F. Greiman died at his home in York, Pa., on June 1, 1911, at the age of 78.

Thomas Watts (89), of Bethune, S. C., passed away November 21, 1911. He was for many years a devoted reader of this paper.

Mrs. O. H. P. Sheldon (85), of Paw Paw, Mich., departed this life on December 1, 1911. For sixty-four years she was a devoted church member.

Mr. Jackson Young (86) died at South Westville, N. J., September 29, 1911. He was a devout Christian and for many years a subscriber to this magazine.

Jane L. Bunker (77) departed this life September 18, 1911, at Bloomfield, N. Y. She was a faithful church member and a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Emma H. Fultz (71) of Geneva, Fla., passed to her eternal rest December 27, 1911. She was a true Christian and a loyal member of the HERALD Family.

Mrs. E. D. Chapman (62) died November 22, 1911, at Rummerfield, Pa. For twenty years she cared for her invalid husband, who preceded her by only three weeks to their heavenly home.

William Gunn, of Harbor Beach, Mich., was called higher December 25, 1911. He was a true Christian and friend. During the many years that he subscribed to this paper, after enjoying its weekly contents, he passed it on to others.

Chinese Students Help Famine Relief

THE Chinese students at Columbia University, New York, have decided to hold an entertainment on April 22 at the West Side Branch of the Young Men's Christian Association, Fifty-seventh Street, for the purpose of raising some fund to relieve the famine-stricken people in China. The program will include pictures on the Chinese Revolution, Chinese magic, a Chinese orchestra, and a series of performances, showing the Manchu Court, its corruptions, its ceremonial rites and the life of Yuan Shi Kai. Those who are to take part in the entertainment are the Chinese boy and girl students in New York City. All funds realized from the sale of tickets will be applied to famine relief.

It's all in the angle!

The clean, smooth, slanting stroke that meets and cuts the beard at an angle, without pulling or scraping—the stroke of the expert barber—is the natural stroke of the Young, and the "any angle" feature does it. The is the diagonal stroke made safe. It shaves clean, it shaves quick and shaves with absolute safety. It shaves the way the experienced barber shaves and with an edge as keen. But with the barber it is expertness; with you it is the Young Razor and its "angle" feature. A touch tilts the blade, so that a straight pull on the handle produces a slanting stroke with the blade.

There is nothing to learn—the skill is in the razor.

Try the slanting stroke shave with a Young Razor. You will find the blades as keen and as smooth-cutting as the finest tempered steel, carefully ground, honed, and stropped, can make them. You will find the razor itself the lightest, handiest, simplest, and most nicely balanced of any you have ever used.

30 Day Trial

Dealers are authorized to take back the Young and refund the purchase price, if after using it thirty days you wish to return it. If your dealer cannot supply you, order from us, with same return privilege. Price, including 12 keen blades, with genuine leather case $3.00

The Bible and the Citizen

BY CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

OUR Pilgrim fathers brought the Bible to American shores as their chief guide for both church and state. With it they solved their early problems in the settlement of social and civic disputes and of nation-building. Indeed, the cardinal object in leaving the fatherland was in order that these sturdy religious crusaders might be untrammeled in their inclination and convictions concerning this Book. Individual liberty of interpretation of the Scriptures, with a deep personal freedom of conscience, made the Bible the first book of these early founders of state. In the squares and commons of New England we still see the significant stone or bronze Pilgrim with a Bible beneath his arm—his constant companion and guardian for life.

The degree to which later questions of American civic, municipal, and national life have depended upon the Bible is not always fully apprehended. Dr. W. W. Moore, in his excellent treatise entitled The Indispensable Book, draws attention to the fact that our American idea of government, making the rulers exist for the good of the people, was derived from the Old Testament teaching of God to the Hebrews. There the Oriental idea of government, as existing for the sake of lifting into prominence the ruler, is revised:

> For the Lord's portion is his people. (Deut. 32: 9.)
> For the Lord taketh pleasure in his people: he will beautify the meek with salvation. (Ps. 149: 4.)
> As yet exaltest thou thyself against my people, that thou wilt not let them go? (Ex. 9: 17.)
> If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as a usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury. (Ex. 22: 25.)

If one would discover the influence of the Bible in our national citizenship, let him read the Constitution of the United States, or some of the early books of law, making note of Biblical references and allusions. The Bible is quoted in almost every one of America's impressive public documents, in virtually every great and national message, and it is the attendant of well-nigh every important ceremonial or sacrament of American civic and national life. Bible precepts are woven into nearly every creed—social, religious or political—of the nation. Indeed, the stronger fraternal organizations have given so large a place in their rituals to the Bible that some members of such societies regard their vow of allegiance as equivalent to a Christian vow.

Virtually every great representative American has not only spoken of the Bible, but has made a thorough study of this Book. Andrew Jackson spoke of the Bible as the rock on which our republic rests. Lincoln knew the Bible better than any other one piece of literature; his sayings and his words remaining to us are filled with references of high estimation for the Christian Scriptures. A certain kind of skepticism was assigned to Thomas Jefferson, but he once made this statement: "I always have said and always will say that the perusal of the sacred volume will make better citizens, better fathers, and better Christians." The statements of Ulysses Grant are well known: "Hold fast to the Bible as the sheet-anchor of our liberties; write its precepts on your hearts and practice them in your lives."

In view of the evident importance of the message of the Bible to our nation, let us consider its concrete word to our own times. As this Book has had a voice for every mood of our country's life, it must have something definite and direct to say to us to-day. It would seem that there has not been a time in American history when, as a people, we were more busily engaged in shaping and readjusting our national and international policies, in building up mighty fortunes, in revamping our social and religious creeds in the light of new demands, in building a government of the people, and by the people, upon principles equal and just.

To such a time as this the word of the Bible comes to Americans in a threefold message—to our commercial, to our political and to our spiritual life.

The Bible's Message to American Commerce

The sixty-six varied and vital books of Scripture have a direct bearing upon the world of affairs. These pages are alive with examples of kingdoms and men rising only to fall because they have not seen clearly the real objective of wealth and business. Babylon and Rome, Athens and Jerusalem, Solomon and Cæsar are in the Bible for a purpose. How many of our citizens are reading these thrilling histories and biographies in relation to our own times?

Jesus' descriptions and teachings reveal the fact that he anticipated the difficulties of seeing in correct proportion the things of the world. With pathetic humor he pictures men foolishly building houses on sand; short-sightedly erecting new barns to hold fleeting treasure; rich men thinking to buy happiness with gold; souls that gain the world but lose themselves. He describes also people like ourselves who give little time to reflection; often worried and busy with the cares and deceitfulness of worldly accumulation; missing the "better part" that he said Mary, the sister of Lazarus, had chosen. He is constantly reminding us of the pearl of great price, and the bread of life, whereof if a man eat, Jesus declares, he shall never die. The peace that passeth knowledge, the rest that is untouched by fears of the morrow, the joy made full in unselfish labor for others, the death that is a door to more abundant life—such values the Master is ever placing in direct contrast to mere things.

In other words, the Bible brings our commercial ideas to the judgment-seat of wisdom, which the Old Testament writer calls "understanding." It is judgment, sense of right, proper perspective upon the affairs of life, character, ability to see through the action to the goal—this is the gift of Bible study. It reminds us constantly that the kingdom of God and his righteousness have their rightful home in the practical relationships of everyday life.

This time-spirit, this emphasis upon things as gods, is due to haste, to the fitful unrest and confusion of our days rather than to our lack of seriousness. Frequently I meet men in travel who confess that they have not read a book in a year. These men are not frivolous men—quite the opposite. They are specialists in buying and selling, in advertising, in real estate, in money, crops, machinery or politics; but they are looking at "their thing" so closely that they see but dimly, if at all, the broader horizon of life. They are men who can not see the woods for the trees. I asked a fellow traveler recently about the chief political tendencies of his section; his answer was, "I am too busy to bother about politics." Such men, who are too busy to observe the signs of the times, are also too preoccupied to discover whither their own lives are tending.

The danger of American life to-day is that the majority of the people will come to believe that nothing pays but that which brings money. If such conditions become universal, this nation, like Babylon, will be crushed by the vulgarity of its ambition, smothered beneath the mountain of its materialism.

In the last ten years we have witnessed a remarkable moral renaissance in American public affairs.

Do Away With the Truss

New Appliance invented guaranteed to retain rupture comfortably at all times

Sent on Trial

It is a well-known fact that while great improvements have been made in almost every conceivable thing to lessen the burdens of afflicted mankind everywhere, and to make the sufferer more comfortable, the undisputed fact still remains that ruptured men who are not only disqualified for work, but are also suffering untold misery and are each moment in danger of death, have been absolutely compelled to wear the same old, ungainly, cumbersome, torturous trusses that their forefathers used in the Dark Ages.

The pad or devise that is applied to the rupture is the all important feature of any mechanical arrangement for retaining rupture. Nearly all the trusses of to-day consist of a pad of wood, hard rubber, or felt attached to a band of steel or cloth with great pads on the back which necessarily press upon and often disease parts of the body that before were in a perfectly healthy condition.

C. E. BROOKS, the Inventor of the Rupture Appliance

The Brooks Appliance is fitted with an AUTOMATIC AIR-CUSHION which follows every movement of the body, always covers the ruptured spot and is always where it should be to do the most good. The part of the cushion which comes in contact with the skin is soft, pliable gum rubber. It clings closely, so that irritation and slipping is impossible, and yet it is cool and comfortable because of the constant circulation of air through it. It is simple of construction, so there is nothing to get out of order—nothing that can break.

We are selling this Appliance under a positive guarantee of money refunded if not satisfactory. We do NOT guarantee to cure any more than any doctor will guarantee to cure his patient. We DO guarantee to furnish a perfect fitting Appliance, one that will give the wearer solid comfort and retain the protrusion at all times and under all circumstances.

The purchaser is the sole judge of the efficiency of the Appliance, and if for any reason whatever (which does not have to be furnished us) it is returned, the price paid will be refunded in full. Thus you see it is sold strictly on its merits.

This Appliance is endorsed and adopted by thousands of physicians, and we can furnish references and recommendations in any county or city in the U. S. A. The United States War Department has purchased quantities of our Appliances for Hospital use during the past eight years, and this fact alone stands out as greater proof of its efficiency than any argument we could advance.

Further information regarding the Appliance, rules for self measurements and catalogue sent Free in sealed envelope.

This revival of conscience in connection with our national life can be traced to several causes. It is inherent in the temperament of Americans, who are frankly honest, though long suffering, intensely earnest, often excessive, and frequently changeable in their pursuance of serious lines of action. Able and earnest men in public life have revealed the slumbering righteousness in the nation's heart and have given it a voice. The voice, however, in many instances was that of Sinai rather than the Mount of Olives. The method of reform was by external legislation, by exaction, by the "thou shalt not," the force of might rather than the persuasive and sovereign power of inner voluntary choice. The weakness of this system lies in its failure to produce principles of rightmindedness and individual standards applicable to all occasions. As a wise Christian Senator remarked, in the midst of this furor of reform, the deeply essential message of the Christian Gospel is still an undiscovered country by the modern man of affairs.

But now to one who listens intently for the voice of the people there comes the cry for a deeper reform; otherwise we could not have such wonderful works as those of the Laymen's Missionary enterprise, the awakening of church brotherhoods all over the land, the Student Volunteer Movement, the Bible study awakening in the colleges, the Men and Religion campaign as wide as the nation, together with the no less distinctive religious movements or social betterment in America—campaigns engaging men regardless of nationality, station or creed.

If these movements are to be anything other than colossal moral, religious and social trusts, with religion as a dress and not a dynamic, the individual must be touched in the realm of his spirit life. He must be more than an opportunist in moral and social reform. Honesty must be something more than the best policy. It must be a part of a deeper strain of personal righteousness, gripping not only a few leaders at the summit of society, but holding also the individual units of that society, and that in a systematic fashion.

Suppose for example that we could get the majority of the individuals in America to spend one half hour daily reading the New Testament, and to continue this reading for a single month. Do you not believe that we would secure a different product in our national awakening? Do you not think it would change our attitude toward war? Would it not make the brotherhood of man something concrete rather than a high-sounding phrase in the journals of self-absorbed social and ethical propagandists?

The New Game, Bunt

HAVE you played Bunt? The game started rather recently in a co-ed prep. school somewhere west of the Mississippi River, and now pretty nearly every lively boy and girl in prep. or boarding-schools talks Bunt scores. The game was bound to be popular from the first, because it is lively and can be played by boys and girls alike. Any number over four can play; all you need is a playground and a well-filled six-inch bean-bag. First choose the umpire, then divide the players into two equal sides; "Game will last 20 minutes," calls the umpire. "Play ball! Ready!" and up he throws the bag high into the air. Immediately both sides scramble to catch it. The one who catches the ball throws it swiftly to a player on his own side, who in turn instantly tries to throw it to another and another, keeping the ball in play, trying to keep it from getting into the enemy's hands, and all hands do all they can to prevent the ball from falling to the ground. The bag once in play, points may be scored; first, by getting the bag away from the enemy; second, by fouls (holding the bag a moment too long is always a foul and may be counted one point against the side whose player makes that likely mistake); third, touching the bag while it is still in another player's hand scores one point to the other side; fourth, letting the ball fall counts a point off; fifth, throwing the bag to a player who is within two yards, counts two points off. When the bag has dropped and is on the ground, it is "out of play," and only the umpire may pick it up and throw it straight into the air, thus putting it again in play.

ON ARBOR DAY

HE WHO plants a tree
Plants a hope.
Rootlets up through fibers blindly grope;
Leaves unfold into horizons free.
So man's life must climb
From the clods of time
Unto heavens sublime.
Canst thou prophesy, thou little tree,
What the glory of thy boughs shall be?

He who plants a tree
Plants a joy;
Plants a comfort that will never cloy;
Every day a fresh reality.
Beautiful and strong
To whose shelter throng
Creatures blithe with song.
If thou couldst but know, thou happy tree,
Of the bliss that shall inhabit thee!

He who plants a tree,
He plants love;
Tents of coolness spreading out above
Wayfarers he may not live to see.
Gifts that grow are best;
Hands that bless are blest;
Plant; Life does the rest!
Heaven and earth help him who plants a tree,
And his work its own reward shall be.

THE PERFECT APPLE

What makes a perfect apple? Pyrox makes a perfect apple by protecting fruit and foliage from codling moth and other leaf eating insects besides acting as a fungicide. It makes the fruit hang on a week or ten days longer in the Fall which gives better color, waxiness and keeping quality, giving that "finish" which brings the top market price. If you like good fruit,—use Pyrox and have it. Wise growers are ordering early. Ask the Bowker Insecticide Co., of Boston, for book on spraying.

Canada's Memorial Tower

THE citizens of Halifax, Nova Scotia, received a surprise a few weeks ago on learning that the memorial tower designed to commemorate the establishment of representative government in the British dominions beyond the seas was, to outward appearances, been completed. When the beautiful northwest arm was deserted in the fall by the canoeists and picnickers the tower was still far from completion. But when the freezing over of the land-locked sheet of water in January attracted hundreds for the winter sports they found the tower in its completed state.

On the second of October, 1908, Duncan Cameron Fraser, the physical and intellectual giant who so honorably filled the position of lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia up to the time of his death, laid the cornerstone of the memorial tower. The start to build, however, was not seriously made until a year ago. The completed tower is free from debt, a monument not only to the great event it commemorates but to the promoters who succeeded in interesting practical, unsentimental men sufficiently to obtain their financial co-operation.

The Representative Government Memorial at Halifax, N. S.

Sir Sandford Fleming has given about one hundred acres of his property on the famous Northwest Arm to the city for use as a public park, and the tower stands on a promontory that is included in the section recently taken over by the city. The memorial is striking in its rugged simplicity of design, yet its severe lines give to its two hundred feet of height a dignity and symbolism that must impress even the most casual observer. The lower part of the tower is of native ironstone, while the top and base are of Nova Scotia's typical gray granite. This tower is to Halifax and Canada what the Statue of Liberty is to New York and the United States. The sentiment expressed by the Halifax tower is no less significant to Canada and the whole British Empire than that expressed by the New York statue.

Nova Scotia got representative government in 1758, the first assembly meeting at Halifax, October 2, 1758. In 1786 the first assembly of New Brunswick met at St. John. The first Upper Canada assembly met at Niagara in 1792 and the first assembly for Lower Canada at Quebec the same year. Newfoundland's first assembly met at St. Johns in 1833. New Zealand, Australia, and South Africa, which did not have elective legislatures for a century after representative government had been granted to Nova Scotia, have contributed financially and historically to the project. Sculptured panels, executed in the indigenous stone of these Southern dominions, will be placed in chambers in the tower. The coats-of-arms of all the provinces of Canada, executed in stone indigenous to the provinces, together with panels in stone from a dozen Canadian universities and from Newfoundland, England, Scotland, Ireland, etc., will be found in the chambers and at the stair landings.

It will be a great day for Halifax when His Royal Highness, the Duke of Connaught, formally dedicates the tower in August of the present year. From all corners of Britain's possessions, statesmen will assemble at Halifax to participate in ceremonies which will be unique, even in the history of the empire. The fame of the tower will by that time have been spread abroad, for Halifax is a tourists' Mecca, and each added attraction to the city's vast store of historic landmarks serves to make it more so.

Halifax, N. S. H. W. H.

Buddhists Coming to Christ

AN EXTRAORDINARY spiritual stirring of "the dry bones" of Buddhism is described in the following letter which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received from Miss Susan E. Haswell, a veteran missionary in Burma:

"I have lately returned from a trip to Hinthahdah district. I went in the hopes of getting donations of unhusked rice for my orphans, but found such a number of spiritual inquirers that I had to give my whole time to visiting and conversing with them. For some two or three years past, a very prominent Buddhist priest has been traveling through the length and breadth of the country, exhorting the people to abstain from animal food and to live pure lives. One priest after another has taken up the same role in the several districts and various sects have sprung up in consequence. In this Hinthahdah district, a hermit began to lead a movement towards holiness of life by means of self-denial, solitary meditation, and giving for religious and charitable objects. He had secured over three thousand followers, when he met a catechist of the S. P. G. Mission, who told him of Christ and the way of salvation, and as a result he has united with the church and is seeking to lead his followers also to accept Christ as their Saviour.

"It was among these people that I found myself. It was a joy to tell them of the fulness of the salvation God had provided for them. One well-to-do rice broker came to see me repeatedly, and as I read to him from the Epistle to the Romans and from the fifteenth chapter of I. Corinthians, he exclaimed exultingly: 'This is what I have been searching for—to be freed not only from the punishment of sin, but from sin itself; to be wholly holy and pure; to have a new body and a pure heart, and to dwell forever in the presence of God, in eternal life and blessedness—what more can be desired?'

"On my return, I visited Prome and Mr. Roach of the Baptist Mission told me that there a Buddhist priest was the head of a new sect seeking for righteousness, and that one of the other Buddhist priests who had joined that sect had become a Christian. He was baptized yesterday at the annual meeting of the Prome Association. At Pegu, another Buddhist priest has a following of over two hundred. He has abjured idolatry and taught his people also to do so; and in consequence he and they have been publicly excommunicated by two hundred Buddhist priests who assembled for the purpose.

"In fifty years of mission life, I have never known such a widespread movement Godward among the Buddhists. We feel that the Holy Spirit is the author of the longing desire after real holiness and purity of heart and life which is so marked a characteristic among all these different groups.

Hupmobile Long-Stroke "32" Touring Car, $900

F. O. B. Detroit, including equipment of windshield, gas lamps and generator, oil lamps, tools and horn. Three speeds forward and reverse; sliding gears. Four cylinder motor, 3¼-inch bore and 5½-inch stroke; Bosch magneto; 106-inch wheel base; 32 x 3½-inch tires. Color, Standard Blue. Roadster, $900.

Not the Price; Not the Specifications; But—the Name added to both

You would do this car less than justice if you judged it by its price.

You would fail to do it full justice even if you judged it by the generous specifications.

It is what the car has always stood for, that renders the price remarkable.

It is the Hupmobile record; and the Hupmobile reputation; that emphasize the extraordinary character of the specifications.

The price is not, in itself, sensational—but the high standard of Hupmobile practice, at that price, is sensational.

You do not buy certain large cars of highest price because they boast a longer wheel-base; or more generous proportions in any part of the chassis.

You buy them because their name and their word have always been synonymous with service and worth

And, in its class, the Hupmobile has always held its ideals as high as cars of the highest worth.

It has shown itself worthy of a place beside them—worthy to share the same garage; it has fulfilled its mission as efficiently as they fulfill theirs.

Bear these things in mind as you study the cars in detail—then, and not till then, will you fully realize the remarkable value embodied in the price and in the specifications.

We are quite willing that you should compare this new Hupmobile with cars which sell for several hundred dollars more.

We will cheerfully abide by your decision, if it does not demonstrate either equality or superiority in any definite and positive test which you may designate to the dealer.

A HEAVENLY VISION

MY HEART was sad and discouraged,
And lonely, and sick, and sore,
As I thought of the sorrows of millions,
And pondered them o'er and o'er;
Of the sigh of tired women;
Of the groan of discouraged men;
Of the cry of the broken-hearted,
That sounded again and again;
Of the wail of weeping children,
The strife that would never cease;
And I longed for Christ's coming kingdom,
For the reign of the Prince of Peace.
Then a voice came through the twilight
Like the voice of a silver bell,
And it spoke to my heart of sadness,
And this message to me did tell:

Fear not and be not discouraged;
To labor and win is thy part:
Fear not and be not discouraged,
And I will strengthen thine heart.

Then a light broke on my vision;
The mists fell from my eyes,
And I saw a heavenly being
In splendor before me rise.
And he bade me to lift the fallen;
To cheer and strengthen the weak;
To comfort the broken-hearted,
And help from above to seek.
He showed me a narrow pathway
That was bordered with love untold,
And he pointed a heavenly city
With mansions built of gold,
And his voice rang in the twilight—
A voice that was firm and clear—
And it healed my drooping spirits
With this message of love and cheer:

Fear not and be not discouraged;
To labor and win is thy part;
Fear not and be not discouraged,
And I will strengthen thine heart.

WRITE STORIES THAT WILL SELL
It is simply lack of good stories that forces publishers to print so many poor ones. If you had the necessary training you could probably write better ones than some you read. The Lanery Course in Short Story Writing, Novel Writing and Journalism have helped very many authors toward fame and fortune. A number of our students are earning big money with their pens. One accepted story may cover the entire cost of training. The terms are easy. Write today for our Booklet 21. We criticise and publish manuscripts.

The Mount of the Beatitudes

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE traveler on his way from Nazareth down to the Sea of Galilee leaves Nazareth in the morning, passing through hilly regions, and skirting the wonderful Valley of Esdraelon, which is laid off in squares like a checkerboard by small and fruitful farms with Mount Tabor rising in the background as a sentinel over all. Then the way leads off into a barren desert place, with a low mountain, notable for having two peaks, rising in the distance. When told that this is the "Mount of Beatitudes" there is a thrill in the heart of the traveler, as he recalls Jesus' presence on that mountain, and almost involuntarily he begins to repeat, "Blessed are the poor in spirit. Blessed are they that mourn. Blessed are the meek. Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness. Blessed are the merciful. Blessed are the pure in heart. Blessed are the peacemakers. Blessed are the persecuted."

The mountain's Arabic name is Kurun Hattin, which signifies "the horns of Hattin." The two peaks are the "horns," and "Hattin" is the name of the village close by. But as we think how Jesus has sanctified it by his presence and his words, it seems to resemble a crown, and we would really like to call it "the crown of Hattin." Turning about, a more glorious vision meets the eye. It is "Galilee, sweet Galilee, where Jesus loved so much to be." It looks like a shining pearl in the distance, and to reach it the traveler must descend a precipitous hill of a thousand feet or more, by a winding way along which he will meet caravans of camels. When at last he stands on the shore of Galilee, the Mount of Beatitudes is still in view, as it is only two or three miles away from the Sea.

We are loath to leave the shores of Galilee, but we must draw nearer to the Mount of Beatitudes. We must stand within its very shadow and gaze upward. It is like a ladder let down from heaven. Jacob saw angels ascending and descending on the ladder of his vision; but on the ladder which we seem to see at Hattin, it is Christ himself descending that he may invite us to ascend with him; from first to last it is a ladder of blessing.

"Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." To make the ascent, we must throw off every weight: self-conceit, thinking of ourselves more highly than we ought, is the very first weight to be cast aside. Pride is one to whom we can fitly say, "Your room is better than your company. You displace Christ by keeping his throne room in my heart. By losing you, I shall gain blessedness, because I shall gain Christ, who will bring heaven into my soul when he is set in your place."

"Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted." We take another step up the ladder of blessedness when we are deeply sorry for our wrong-doing. This is the beatitude of the penitent. God will give the healing balm of comfort to those who are penitent. "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you."

"Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." To be meek is to be steadfast and calm, no matter what storms of provocation may be raging around us. Christ stilled the storm on Galilee, and he is just as able to still the storms of our lives if we will only keep him with us as he abode in the ship with the apostles. Let us get a firm grasp of Christ, and we shall be able to maintain our foothold on this third step of the ladder of blessing, showing not only self-control, but what is better, Christ's control over us.

COFFEE HURTS

One In Three.

It is difficult to make people believe that coffee is a poison to at least one person out of every three, but people are slowly finding it out, although thousands of them suffer terribly before they discover the fact.

A New York Hotel man says: "Each time after drinking coffee I became restless, nervous and excited, so that I was unable to sit five minutes in one place, was also inclined to vomit and suffered from loss of sleep, which got worse and worse.

"A lady said that perhaps coffee was the cause of my trouble, and suggested that I try Postum. I laughed at the thought that coffee hurt me, but she insisted so hard that I finally had some Postum made. I have been using it in place of coffee ever since, for I noticed that all my former nervousness and irritation disappeared. I began to sleep perfectly, and the Postum tasted as good or better than the old coffee, so what was the use of sticking to a beverage that was injuring me?

"One day on an excursion up the country I remarked to a young lady friend on her greatly improved appearance. She explained that some time before she had quit using coffee and taken Postum. She had gained a number of pounds and her former palpitation of the heart, humming in the ears, trembling of the hands and legs and other disagreeable feelings had disappeared. She recommended me to quit coffee and take Postum and was very much surprised to find that I had already made the change.

"She said her brother had also received great benefits from leaving off coffee and taking on Postum." "There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Sunday School Lesson

"Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness." This is the fourth step of the heavenly ladder. We could not reach it if we had not taken the first step of self-renunciation, the second step of repentance, and the third step of self-control. As we have climbed higher a new vista has opened before us, even to be somewhat like the Christ, who has so graciously come down to us. We would be, and do, and love, like him, and so blossom out into all righteousness."

"Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." We are now looking toward the fifth step of the ladder, and we hear the voice of Jesus saying to us tenderly: "I will betroth thee unto me in justice, and in loving kindness, and in mercies" (Hosea 2: 19). Then he draws us up to the place that we could never have reached without his help. Instead, we should have thought it our duty to hate those who had wronged us. But when Jesus shows us how all our sins are forgiven in his dear name, we learn that, to be and do and love like him, we must be willing to forgive those who have wronged us. It is only thus that we can make our own forgiveness sure, for Jesus has said: "If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses."

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." It is only a clean mirror that will reflect an image. Some of us have undoubtedly seen a mirror so covered with smoke or dirt that we could not see ourselves at all, or very imperfectly, as we looked into it. The pure mind and heart of Christ always reflected the image of his Father, for he said himself, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father" (John 14: 9). We dare not stand beside him on this sixth step of the ladder unless we pray daily to be cleansed from all unrighteousness, for the wrong things we have done, and for the right things we have failed to do, which make up the sum of our sins of commission and omission.

"Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God." The peacemaker is not the ideal man in the eyes of the world, but rather the military hero who writes his name in the blood of his foes on the temple of fame. But Jesus the Prince of Peace is standing on the seventh step of the ladder of blessedness, and he would help us to stand beside him. We reach the place, and are surprised to find how great is the company who have gathered about him, and it has come to be that "peace hath her victories" more renowned than war. "Lay down your arms!" is the slogan now resounding in almost every part of the world, and it does seem that a time is coming when there will be no more demand either for large guns or small ones, because there are those who seek to make peace rather than war between nations and classes of society, who would substitute arbitration alike for battles and strikes. If we have silver and gold, let us freely give it to promote peace on earth; but if we have not silver and gold, we can have what is even greater—the mind of Christ, to work for peace and pray for it, with the full assurance that he will accomplish it.

"Blessed are they that have been persecuted for righteousness' sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." How near to the top of the ladder of blessing we have come! But while our heads are reaching almost into heaven, our feet are upon a dangerous round. Let us think of the thousands of blessed martyrs who have stood there undismayed, nothing wavering. They endured as seeing him who is invisible. They heard his invitation to advance one step further, and stand even beside him in heavenly fields: "Rejoice, and be exceeding glad; for great is your reward in heaven."

Why Big Stores Sell Holeproof Hose

Holeproof Hose—six pairs guaranteed six months—are sold by the greatest stores in the country. "Holeproof" are the original guaranteed hose, the kind backed by 38 years of experience. Six pairs are guaranteed six months. New pairs will be given for any that wear out within that time.

The original has the greatest demand of any guaranteed hose on the market because of its vastly superior quality.

Only the Best Yarn Used for "Holeproof"

We use only yarn that costs an average of 70 cents per pound, while yarn can be bought for 30 cents. But ours is three-ply, soft and fine. It is more pliable than two-ply. Hence the hose can be made at once lighter and stronger.

FAMOUS Holeproof Hosiery FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN

Then, "Holeproof" are made in twelve colors, five grades and ten weights, suiting every man's preference. For long wear in hose of correct style and good fit there is nothing to equal the genuine "Holeproof." See the assortment at the good stores in your city today.

Avoid Imitations

To avoid imitations—amateur brands—look for the "Holeproof" trademark and the signature of Mr. Carl Freschl, on the toe of each pair. The prices range from $1.50 to $3.00 for six pairs, according to finish and weight.

Six pairs of children's stockings, guaranteed six months, $2.00. "Holeproof" are just the thing for romping, growing children. Decide today to try "Holeproof."

to $100,000. For the great work of enlightenment, inspiration and salvation carried on by this committee a sum less than the lower of these figures was asked. After subscription pledges had been collected, the audience rose as the choir began the great "Hallelujah Chorus," and stood while the immortal music rolled on:

King of kings and Lord of lords,
Hallelujah, Hallelujah!
And he shall reign
Forever and ever,
King of kings and Lord of lords,
Hallelujah!

The closing prayer was made by Dr. Edgar Tilton; the benediction was pronounced by Dr. Addison Moore.

Plans for the Conservation Congress to be conducted by the Men and Religion Forward Movement at New York April 19-24 are about completed. It is expected that President Taft, Ambassador Bryce, William Jennings Bryan, Bishop Greer of New York, Archdeacon Madden of Liverpool, Bishop McDowell of Chicago, Dr. C. B. Gray of Glasgow, Dr. J. H. Jowett, Booker T. Washington, Robert E. Speer, John R. Mott and J. Campbell White will deliver addresses. The name of one woman is included in the list of speakers, that of Miss Jane Addams of Chicago, who will discuss the problem of the social evil. Three thousand delegates to this congress will be sent from the various cities in which the movement has conducted campaigns. Nine commissions are at work, preparing data on the various phases of religious and welfare work undertaken by the movement.

On April 15, 16 and 17, institutes of the New York campaign are being held, at which expert speakers are giving instructions in methods for Boys' Work, Bible Study, Evangelism, Missions, Social Service and Community Extension. These sessions will culminate in a general institute to be held at Carnegie Hall on April 18.

School for Blind at Yokohama

THE Yokohama Christian Blind School, founded eighteen years ago by Mrs. Draper, mother of a missionary to Japan, is still carrying on its unique work. Mrs. Draper became interested in the pitiful plight of the blind people of Yokohama while visiting her son in that city, and determined to make it possible for them to learn the profession of massage, which is the work undertaken by practically all the blind people of Japan, under Christian influences. In the school the Bible and Christian hymns are taught as well as arithmetic, history, geography, physiology and hygiene. Ito, one of the pupils, besides his other duties, has been diligently preparing a Japanese hymn-book for the blind. The graduates of the school have raised money from their small earnings, to make the plates for publishing the books. The youngest graduate, Hashimoto, who is not only blind but deaf, is now supporting, at the age of sixteen, his father and himself. He is an ardent admirer of the United States and composed a creditable poem to the American fleet which recently visited Japanese waters. The lines of this afflicted boy, translated into English, make a bit of really noble verse:

We cannot see the noble Fleet
That crowns our bay
Nor yet the myriad lights that turn
Our night to day.

Nor can we hear the children sing
Their welcome song
Nor roll of drum, nor trampling feet
Of countless throng.

Yet in our hearts we yield to none
Who shout "Well-come"
And pray for all your gallant ships
Safe voyage home.

FREE: Four Booklets Which Have Taught Many People to Cure Themselves

One clever young university student writes from Lincoln, Nebr.:

"I have confidence in this system. It has relieved an unsightly skin and mental inertia through the valuable suggestions and hints in your four booklets. There is a mine of practical hints in them; enough to convince a skeptic, were he to stick to the rules faithfully, and give it a trial.

"I have already gained more brain and nerve force—more efficiency without enforced exercise.

"Your little books eliminated chronic catarrh from my system in about three weeks. To put it weakly, I was astonished. I know now that butter, eggs and rich cream caused the trouble. I thank you for your knowledge, and hope to learn more of your system in the future."

Different Classes of Foods Cause Different Diseases

I have produced in myself at will from time to time such complaints as rheumatism, catarrh, fevers, kidney trouble, blackheads, sores, dandruff, etc., by eating different classes of foods to excess, proving that the waste from each class of foods produces an entirely different disease. For instance, eggs, cream, butter, cheese, milk and salt are mucus-making foods which produce catarrh. Starch and eggs (paste-making foods) in wrong combinations congest and produce headache, dullness, brain fag, etc., while lean meats, green vegetables and fresh, juicy fruits do not.

—no fasting
—no exercises

G. H. BRINKLER, Food Expert

A thin man, after being out of work nearly a year through weakness, was restored in three weeks to hard work as a carpenter at full pay. In such cases the change from a clogging, death-producing diet to energizing foods caused a literal transformation.

Another patient, deaf in the right ear, owing to a discharge caused by an excess of mucus-making foods (cream, butter, cheese, etc.), was completely cured of deafness and catarrh by taking correct combinations of suitable foods.

A case of kidney and bladder trouble of ten years' standing was saved from a surgical operation, and the objectionable discharge cured within ten days, because the loss of control was due entirely to the constant irritation from certain irritating foods and drinks.

Correct Combinations of Foods Cure Diseases

I have always cured the above-named symptoms in a few days or weeks by returning to a correctly combined diet. The experiments have been fascinating, and the results underlie success in life.

Brainy Diet

A chronic sufferer, weighing 415 pounds, unable to exercise, took correct combinations of ordinary daily foods and reduced over 150 pounds (in public life, under many witnesses) gained strength with firmer flesh, and lost rheumatism.

People Write:

"My brain power and general efficiency have been about doubled this year by selecting brainy foods. I have made a fortune in real estate, and the credit is honestly yours."

"The government should investigate and teach the Brainy Diet System for the good of the nation."

"The hints in Booklet No. III, on foods for curing congested liver, nourishing the brain, etc., are worth untold dollars, although the books are free."

Questions and Answers

T. L. R., Toronto, Canada. 1. In a sermon I heard a short time ago on Samson, the preacher stated that Delilah was Samson's lawful wife. Is there any authority for this assertion? 2. It was stated in one of our papers a short time since that Paul never met Jesus while he was on earth. Under all the circumstance, I would think that this was hardly possible.

1. There is very slight reason for holding that she stood in the relation of a wife to Samson, although Chrysostom and several of the early fathers have maintained that they were married, and Milton the poet makes an allusion to the same effect. Judges 16: 9-18 would seem to prove the opposite, however. 2. Paul himself, in Acts 26: 19, records the only instance in this connection, when he refers to the "heavenly vision," which appeared at his conversion.

R. F. B., Union City, Pa. Can it be true that Peter, one of the three nearest to the Lord, was not yet converted? (See Luke 22: 32.)

Peter was a man of resolute character, bold and decisive. He was easily the leader of the twelve. Honest-hearted and warmly attached to Christ, he believed himself immovably loyal; yet in the hour of temptation he proved unstable and weak. Jesus knew his heart and warned him against over-confidence in his own loyalty. "I have been praying for thee," he said, "that thy faith fail not." He needed this divine strengthening. His faith had failed once before in a crisis (see Matt. 14: 29), and what he needed to confirm him now was the "power from on high" which would come later. The tempter was to sift all the disciples, and Jesus foresaw Peter's weakness, but he was preserved from falling by this special intercession. His case shows, perhaps more completely than any other in the New Testament, the weakness of the natural and the strength of the spiritual man. Even at the moment of his denial of Christ, it needed but a glance from the eye of his Lord to make him instantly repentant. After the enduement with the Holy Ghost, he stood forth as the leader of the apostles, faithful unto death.

Mrs. J. C. H., Saco, Me., and E. B. G., Owosso, Mich. Where is the ninety-sixth Psalm repeated in the Bible?

You will find it repeated, with a few trifling variations, in I Chron. 16: 23-33, where it comes chronologically in its right place as David's song of thanksgiving on the safe bringing in of the ark. It was transferred to the book of Psalms, which was the Jewish hymnal, where it stands as a psalm of thanksgiving and remembrance. In one place it is in its true historical setting, and in the other it forms a part of the temple service.

B. F. L., Eufaula, Wash. 1. In Luke 20: 27-40, Jesus was replying to questions about the resurrection. Marriage was ordained to perpetuate the human family, but as there will be no breaches by death in the future state, the ordinance will cease and man will be like the angels in his immortal nature. This immortality, however, referred only to "those who shall be counted worthy." 2. "Calling" implies believing; believing, hearing; hearing, preaching; and preaching in its turn implies a mission to preach. Education, however desirable, is not enough; the preacher must have the divine words of life fixed in his own heart, and must know the truth before he can transmit it to others. The talents referred to in the parable are our abilities, our gifts, our possessions, the means at our command of which we are expected to make worthy use. The parable applies to ministers as well as to laymen—in fact to all.

Reader, Brattleboro, Vt. A church not far from here recently gave a ladies' negro minstrel show to raise money for the church. It seems to me that it was a very poor way to obtain money for the Lord's work.

Several readers have written us letters similar to the foregoing. There are so many unobjectionable means of raising money for church purposes that it is greatly to be regretted when any church descends to the vulgar level of vaudeville. Indeed, in most churches such a thing would not be encouraged or tolerated. Minstrel shows, lotteries, suppers and the like are altogether out of place in religious work. There is in some quarters a growing latitude in this respect; but it is certain that such methods lower the spiritual vitality and influence of any church. The temptation to ally the service of God's house with worldly entertainment of a sensational or doubtful character should be strongly reprehended.

E. C. S., Wilmington, N. C. What does the number 12 in the Bible mean or symbolize?

There are certain numbers employed in Scripture that are known as sacred or symbolical numbers. Among these are seven (perfection), as the triune symbol of deity and the four quarters of the earth; forty, a "round number," signifying duration, distance, quantity; ten (completeness); five, as used in offerings, etc.; four, related to the quarters of the globe, the shape of the holy of holies in the temple, etc.; three, symbol of supreme divinity; twelve, which derives its significance from the twelve tribes and which has been called the "square number," the "zodiacal number," the "apostolic number." 12x12 means, symbolically, fixity and completeness, and taken a thousand-fold, it gives the grand multiple of 144,000 (otherwise a countless multitude), one thousand symbolizing the world wholly pervaded by the divine—a world redeemed!

B. M., St. Louis, Mo. We have had quite a discussion here concerning card-playing, as to whether it should be tolerated or discouraged in Christian circles. What is your view of the matter?

While card-playing may be an innocent amusement, as some contend, it is, in most cases, a waste of precious time. In many instances it leads to gambling. Further, it is not an accomplishment that helps one in the battle of life, for it can never be urged as a recommendation in business, but would rather be the reverse. The Medical Journal, a recognized authority, has this to say about it: "It is a pure and simple mental dissipation that grows upon the victim, like all other dissipations, to the eventual exclusion of logical and close thinking. On the young, it exercises its narcotizing influence with irresistible force. Appealing primarily to the imperfectly balanced mind, cards soon reduce that of a better quality to the same level. They are comparable in every way to the habit-forming drugs, and lead surely to the neglect of every sane and healthy amusement, to say nothing of business and professional duties." To the professing Christian, there is one consideration which should outweigh all others: card-playing is indisputably an impediment to spiritual growth and should therefore be avoided. Besides, our example may influence others, and if we should be the means of leading even one person into an evil habit, we ourselves should rigidly guard against that habit.

L. L. K., Kohler, Ontario. John was called the "disciple whom Jesus loved" (John 13: 23, 21: 7 and 21: 20). The Saviour commended Mary to the keeping of John, while he hung on the cross (see John 19: 26, 27). Peter, however, by many is regarded as having been the leading spirit of the band. 2. The elder son was a type of the jealous, envious Pharisee, ungrateful for the blessings he himself enjoyed, and unwilling to share them with others.

THE WOMEN OF THE SOUTH

THE commission in charge of the dedication at Columbia of the South Carolina monument to the women of the Confederacy, the first monument to women ever erected independently by a single State of the Union, set April 11 as the day of the unveiling. The monument was to have been dedicated on December 14 last, but a delay in the arrival of the bronze necessitated a postponement. The monument represents the Southern woman, calm, dignified and beautiful, waiting to be crowned with laurel by a majestic winged figure of the genius of the State. On each side are childish figures representing the spirit of the New South burdened with triumphant wreaths to lay at her feet. The seated figure typifies the undaunted spirit of the Southern woman who, in silent heroism fought her hardest battles after the close of that cataclysm that rocked our nation upon its foundations. Into the face of this symbolic woman the sculptor has put a mysticism that almost speaks of a vision of the glorious progress of to-day rising to obliterate the cruel scars that were the result of years of war upon these fair States. With official representatives of her State Legislature, militia, war veterans, and the Daughters of the Confederacy, South Carolina turned out all her silver-tongued orators to make the ceremonies of the dedication something to be remembered.

A. H., Hamilton, Ontario. 1. Kindly tell me if Isa. 66: 22, 23 proves that our Lord in the millennium will claim in some special way one day in seven, still calling it his Sabbath? 2. Is Matt. 24: 20 past history or is it still in the future? 3. In James 5: 4 do the words, "the Lord of Sabaoth" mean the Lord of the Sabbath?

1. In the latter half of this chapter, the prophet describes Jerusalem in millennial times, a joy to the whole earth. The Sabbath was to be a perpetual obligation while the world lasted. 2. The prophecy in Matt. 24 was fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem, but (as has been previously explained) the prophecy had a double horizon, the farther pointing to the trials and tribulations that will afflict the church immediately before the second coming. The passage in Isaiah referred to is a part of his Messianic prophecies which pictures the whole earth redeemed and filled with the knowledge of the Lord, with the ancient glories of Israel restored and the worship of Jehovah a universal worship, with special observance of the divinely ordained Sabbath. 3. Although "Sabbath" is a Greek form of the Hebrew Sabbath, some eminent scholars hold that it has a totally different meaning and signifies "a host" or "an army." Its plural is used in the sense of armies and its singular in some cases represents the angelic host that surround the throne of heaven. (See I. Kings 22: 19.) The passage in James 5: 4 means that he is the Lord of Hosts, the protector of the poor, who will avenge them.

F. F. F., Oshkosh, Wis. The statement is made to a question by "S. W., Keene, N. H.," in THE MAIL-BAG that "any work on the Lord's day that is not either of necessity or mercy is a desecration." This causes confusion of thought in my mind. Seeing that according to the Bible the Creator of heaven and earth commenced his creation work on the day mentioned, the Lord's day "so-called." How shall I understand it?

The Sabbath was divinely ordained as a day of cessation from labor. In the Jewish church, the restrictions were most rigid and profanation of the day was severely punished. It was a day of rest, reconciliation, worship and religious festivity. (See Isa. 58: 13: 14.) Christian Sabbath observance recognizes the same general obligation to abstain from regular vocations and to devote the day largely to rest and worship. Jesus himself rebuked the slavish Sabbatic restrictions of the Scribes and Pharisees, and showed them that the Sabbath was made for man, meaning that it was designed and instituted for our common humanity and to conduce to our highest good. He pointed out that there were various acts which in themselves were not sinful, but meritorious and such as might be done on the Sabbath. These were the works of necessity or of mercy. This is the attitude of the Christian church of to-day on Sabbath observance (Col. 2: 16.) It may be briefly said that no labor should be performed on that day which can be done on secular days, and that works of charity and mercy are justified on that day. We have the divine example for abstention in Gen. 2: 2, 3.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. W. C. H., Worry, N .C. The passage in Deut. 28: 5 gives a blessing on the little things and the big things, the whole and the smallest part, so that it has been quaintly called the "wholesale and retail blessing." Of course, there are no such terms literally to be found in the Bible.

Mrs. C. W. Cable, North Salem, N. Y., asks if some reader can supply the remaining verses to this hymn:

Never lose the golden rule,
Keep it still in view.
Do to others as you would
They should do to you.
Kindly, gently in each burden bear a part,
Meekly chiding with a loving heart.

A. S., New Philadelphia, O. Ham had provoked the wrath of his father by his wicked act and as a punishment it was ordained that his descendants should become servants of his brothers and their descendants. As to Noah's right to inflict such a punishment, it is not discussable, as he was merely an instrument in the case, inspired to do what he did as an act of retribution. Evidence of this appears in the fact that it was not Ham himself but his youngest son, Canaan, who was made to suffer for the offense of Noah's youngest son, Ham—an object-lesson of the law afterward enunciated that the "sins of the fathers are visited upon the children."

A Typical Scene at Mound City, Ill. Ground Floors All Flooded

Three Feet of Water in the Flooded Section of Memphis, Tenn.

THE "FATHER OF WATERS" IN FLOOD

THE great man-made banks of the Mississippi have again failed of their purpose. Before the pressure of the greatest spring freshet that has ever been recorded, the levees have gone down in many places, and vast stretches of the low-lying land of five States have been buried by the waters. Heralded by almost unprecedented rains throughout the northern States of the Middle West and by the rapid melting of the snows in the highlands, the tributaries of the Ohio and Missouri gave warning of impending danger by the phenomenal quantities of water they poured into the larger streams. A number of minor floods had happened along the Ohio and Missouri before the giving way of the dikes, which allowed the water to rush over a large section of eastern Missouri.

This first break took place in the Drinkwater Levee, just opposite Cairo, Ill., and during all the following week there came reports of death and ruin from the cities and towns all the way down into Louisiana and Mississippi. One after another the river cities of Kentucky and Tennessee reported rising waters and the destruction of life and property. Belmont and Columbus were the next to feel the effect of the rising flood. Then Hickman, Ky., New Madrid, Mo., Tiptonville, Hathaway, and a number of other cities reported that their inhabitants were deserting their flooded homes or putting forth heroic efforts to keep the levees intact. Hickman, being located on an elevation which put it beyond the danger of inundation, became a center for refugees from all the surrounding country, and as the reports came each day the numbers grew from hundreds into the thousands until it was estimated that before the floods began to abate there were fully eight thousand people gathered there for safety.

As the crest of the flood moved down the river the citizens of all the river towns abandoned their regular occupations, and with one mind went to work upon the levees to add to their height and strengthen places which threatened to weaken and give way under the unusual pressure. From many of the towns came reports of merchants who had not handled a pick or shovel in many a long day, turning to on the embankments, while their schoolboy sons filled bags with earth, and their wives and daughters supplied all the workers with hot coffee and sandwiches. Yet in spite of these heroic efforts, the end of the week showed a great section of the Mississippi Valley converted into an inland sea. Within that week over three-quarters of a million acres of farm land between the mouth of the Ohio and the city of Memphis had been flooded. Every effort was made to keep the water from getting into what is known as the Realfoot Lake district of Tennessee. But in spite of the guarding of the levees and the prompt repairing of damaged spots, the water entered and covered practically all of Lake County.

Farther down the river the efforts to preserve the levees presented practically the same scenes. At Memphis, the northern part of the city was submerged to a depth of between six and eight feet. The electricity and gas supplies of the city were both produced in that section, and it was with the gravest fear that the encroachments of the flood upon these plants was watched. Pumps were put in operation to keep out the seepage, but as the water rose, they themselves were put out of commission and the city was left in darkness. The damage at Memphis was conservatively estimated at $250,000, while there seems little doubt that the damage to property throughout the entire flooded section will total at least $10,000,000. A hundred and twenty-five thousand people were rendered homeless. Yet in spite of the immensity of the district flooded and the great property lost, the number of casualties reported has been providentially small. On the tenth day of the flood only thirty deaths had been reported from the hundreds of miles of territory affected.

Not alone on the Mississippi have the great freshets brought destruction, but up and down many of her tributaries the MINNEAPOLIS is the scene on May 1 of the centennial session of the Delegated Methodist General Conference. About 800 clergymen and laymen constitute this great religious assembly, representing a vast evangelical host of three and a half million church members and nearly four million Sunday School members in all quarters of the globe.

The General Conference of the Methodist Church meets only once in four years. Its last meeting was at Baltimore in 1908, when one hundred and thirty-one annual conferences were represented by seven hundred and ninety delegates, a number which will probably be somewhat increased at the Minneapolis quadrennial. Though the first General Conference of the Methodist Church met in 1792 (eight years after the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Baltimore), it was not until 1812 that the first regularly delegated conference was held.

That event occurred in New York City (and presumably in old Wesley Chapel, now John Street Church). Eight annual conferences were represented by ninety delegates. The church membership of 688 traveling preachers and 184,567 members has grown during the century to 20,569 preachers and 3,518,099 church members. There were no Sunday Schools then. Now there are 36,486. And in place of eight annual conferences in 1812 there are 131 in 1912. The rules or constitution of the church are still in force as they were a century ago.

The Methodist General Conference is a law-making and an executive body. At the Minneapolis meeting, some seventeen standing committees will report on all phases of church work, including foreign missions, home missions and church extension, education, temperance and prohibition, freedmen, Sunday Schools, Epworth League, deaconess work, conference claimants and the state of the church.

In addition there are five general conference commissions to be heard from on federation, federation of colored churches, judicial procedure, ministerial support and evangelism. Bishops, ministers and laymen make up these commissions, with the exception of the commission on ministerial support, which is composed entirely of laymen. The reports since the last quadrennial show an encouraging advance in almost every line. The church roll has increased by 138,555 members, an average gain of nearly 35,000 per year. There are nearly seven hundred new churches, valued at $15,000,000.

The Laymen's Missionary Movement, which was officially recognized by the last General Conference at Baltimore, has taken on strength through the national campaign. It has planned a systematic sustained endeavor to help increase the Methodist force of foreign missionaries to six thousand. An "every-member canvass" is under way to secure weekly offerings to missions and benevolences.

The Board of Conference Claimants, organized four years ago to aid superannuated preachers, the widows and dependent orphans of deceased Methodist ministers, has made a good beginning by helping many thousands of worthy claimants. It is asking the General Conference of 1912 to secure during the next quadrennium (1912-1916) five million dollars for its permanent fund.

The Methodist Brotherhood, which was instituted at the last General Conference, reports great strides to usefulness, having now over eleven hundred chapters, and having held a general convention with delegates from twenty-five States.

A new form of church work to be presented to the Conference is "the Knights of Methodism," an organization to solve "the boy problem"; with a ritual drawn from the Book of Daniel, formulated by a special commission from the Epworth League, Methodist Brotherhood and Board of Sunday Schools.

A good record has been made during the past four years by the Board of Sunday Schools, whose work was outlined by the 1908 General Conference, to found Sunday Schools in needy neighborhoods, to contribute to the support of needy Sunday Schools and to educate the church in all phases of Sunday School work. Twenty-six Sunday School missionaries are now supported, and over one thousand new Sunday Schools have been organized (with a membership of 34,000), out of which 188 new churches have sprung.

The foreign mission fields have been actively cultivated by the various agencies, including the Board of Foreign Missions, which expends over one million dollars a year in nineteen foreign countries; and the Women's Board, which supports three hundred and forty-six missionaries in sixteen lands.

Work at home has been steadily advanced, through more than five hundred missionaries and deaconesses under the Woman's Home Missionary Society; and the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, which expends nearly seven hundred thousand dollars a year and is asking the 1912 General Conference to endorse its movement for the celebration of the semi-centennial of its organization in May, 1914.

A number of bishops are to be elected, as well as editors for important Methodist publications, managers of the denominational publishing houses and other important officials. One of the most serious problems to come before the present Conference is the question of changing the church organization so that the individual bishops will be assigned to a specified territory, having authority over certain conferences during the quadrennium from one General Conference to another. Under the present order the bishop has no more authority in one section than another, although he is assigned by the General Conference to an episcopal residence. The bishops now meet semi-annually and plan their travels; each annual conference is presided over by one of the bishops, and there has hitherto been no system by which a bishop could retain special oversight of any conference or group of conferences. His responsibility ended with the close of the annual conference session. The missionary bishops, however, have formed an exception to this plan; they hold special authority over the fields to which they have been assigned by the General Conference. The senior member of the Methodist episcopacy is Bishop Henry White Warren, who will preside at the opening session.

The "Father of Waters" in Flood

lowlands have been under water. Louisville, Ky., has had an experience with the Ohio at a greater height than ever before, and the Cumberland and Tennessee Rivers have driven the people back from their low-lying shores. The overflow from the Cumberland is shown in one of the accompanying photographs at the very foot of Tennessee's capitol.

As soon as the gravity of the situation was realized the representatives of the affected States made urgent appeals to President Taft to aid the homeless and destitute. The President immediately forwarded to Congress a recommendation for a large appropriation and within fifteen minutes that recommendation, having received the approval of the House of Representatives, was on its way to the Senate. Here with equal rapidity it was passed and Secretary of War Stimson was instructed by the President to use $350,000 for the relief of the flood sufferers. The distribution of food and necessities was handed over to the quartermasters of various districts, and these men, who are highly qualified by training and experience, were rushed to the devastated sections with power to purchase food and supplies and arrange for the use of military tents for temporary shelter. The State authorities have in every case made adequate appropriations for relief work and have placed every possible facility at the disposal of the Federal officers for the distribution of supplies and the arrangement of relief.

Looking from Hickman, Ky., Out Over the Flooded Valley

It is impossible that such an immense area should be flooded without the occurrence of those dramatic incidents and really heroic rescues and warnings to which the Mississippi Valley is by no means a stranger. One of the most pathetic of these incidents of the present flood was the rescue from a tree-top of a mother and her baby. The baby, unconcerned, slept peacefully in its mother's arms when she, having almost reached the stage of final exhaustion, was rescued from her perilous position. Another remarkable case was that of a farmer on the edge of the Realfoot Lake district, who when he saw the levee break shouted to his wife to get herself, the children and some supplies into a boat while he, on the fastest horse his barn contained, galloped off ahead of the flood to warn those of his neighbors who could not be reached by telephone.

MAN'S WAR ON INSECT PESTS

The Effects of Spraying; Unsprayed Trees in the Distance

TAKING the country as a whole, in spite of the great knowledge of a practical character that we have gained of recent years, injurious insects are doing about as much damage as they ever did, and perhaps more. But in the main they are not the same old insects. We know how to handle the old pests. The codling moth and the plum curculio are controlled in the large commercial orchards by spraying. The Hessian fly, that pest of growing wheat introduced at the time of the Revolutionary War, is greatly lessened in its damage by the knowledge of when to plant. The canker worms have almost disappeared, thanks to the introduction of the English sparrow, although this is about the only good thing we ever gained by his introduction.

But new pests have been introduced accidentally from other parts of the world. Some of them are coming under control, while others still offer unsolved problems. The so-called San José scale is now effectively controlled by winter washes in the East, and by parasites or acquired immunity of the trees in the far West, after some twenty years of destructive work. The cotton boll weevil has, since 1893, spread through Texas and Louisiana and parts of Arkansas, Oklahoma, Mississippi and Alabama, and last autumn entered northwestern Florida. No effective remedy which can be generally adopted has yet been found, but, by varying the system of farming and by better cropping methods, cotton can still be raised profitably, and a much better system of farm management in the South is a direct result of the introduction of this scourge from Central America. The gipsy moth and the brown-tail moth have cost the New England States some millions of dollars' worth of damage since their introduction from Europe in 1869 and 1897 respectively; but we understand well how they may be kept in check, and introduced parasites will in a few years keep them down to comparatively harmless numbers. The newly-discovered alfalfa weevil in Utah, however, promises to spread rapidly and to ruin this most important crop unless some effective remedy can be found or some system of control worked out. And we are constantly in danger of the introduction of other foreign pests, which, in the new field of American agriculture, will redouble their destructive work.

Thus it is obvious that the question of damage by insects is an ever-present one. And it is not only the farmer and fruit-grower who suffer loss from insects, but the family which has a small vegetable or flower garden needs to know how to fight these minute enemies. Then, too, domestic animals have their insect pests, and the live-stock industry generally suffers much loss from their work. Forest and shade trees, small ornamental trees, and flowering shrubs have their insect enemies, and it is estimated that in the great forests the loss from insect damage is as great as the loss from forest fires. And this is by no means all. The insect pests of the household are very numerous. They damage our food, our clothing, and the very timbers of which our houses are built. They cause the greatest physical annoyance by their bites and stings and by their presence in our food, and they even kill us by thousands by carrying to us the causative germs of many fatal diseases. Yellow fever and malaria are caused solely by the bites of infected mosquitoes; bubonic plague is apparently caused solely by the bites of infected fleas, typhus by the bites of infected lice, and sleeping sickness by the bites of infected tsetse flies. And the house-fly, that scourge of humanity, may carry typhoid fever, Asiatic cholera, dysentery, infantile diarrhea, tuberculosis, and many other diseases. Taking the insects as a whole, they constitute by far the greatest enemy of the human race.

In spite of all this, the average human being views insects with indifference, and when he once begins to suffer in one way or another from their work he does not know what to do about it.

Now, as a matter of fact, all of our principal injurious insects are very well known. Every phase of their life history has been carefully studied by competent investigators and more or less perfect remedies have been found. Moreover, hundreds of bulletins have been written about them by State and government officials, and many of these, in fact most of them, can be had for the asking. Every State has one or more agricultural experiment stations, and each of these stations has one or more entomologists, while in the Department of Agriculture at Washington there is a Bureau of Entomology which has more than one hundred and fifty skilled investigators of insects. All of the State stations issue leaflets and bulletins and reports, and the Bureau of Entomology has published about three hundred different reports, bulletins and circulars covering practically all of the most injurious insects in the United States.

Gipsy Moth Caterpillars Under a Burlap Band

Does it not seem strange that, with all of this information to be had for the asking, men will employ "tree doctors" to bore auger holes into their fine oak shade-trees and insert sulphur disguised with lampblack with the claim that the mysterious substance will be taken into the circulation of the tree and render its topmost leaves distasteful to all kinds of insects? They will buy for a large price worthless fertilizers because the sellers claim that no insects will harm the crops grown on land where these substances are used. They will put cotton bands around trees because some English gardener has told them that this is the practice in England, not knowing that the English insect thwarted in this way does not occur in the United States. They will buy and use almost any universal remedy they happen to hear about or read about, and the more that is claimed for it the more eagerly they buy, whereas to the knowing one the superfluity of claims makes the fraud more transparent.

Forty years ago, the late Benjamin Dann Walsh, writing of this very thing, closed his scathing summary with the appropriate sentence, "Long live King Humbug! He still feeds fools with flapdoodle, and many of them have large and flourishing families who will perpetuate the breed to the remotest generation."

The number of fraudulent remedies has been rapidly increasing in late years, and the people of the country have wasted very large sums of money on them. Down to last year, many of the mixtures sold for use against household insects had not the slightest real value. One man, who built up a large trade in road dust at fifty cents a pound, is now fortunately in jail, but others equally culpable have escaped and have made very comfortable incomes. There have been hundreds of other cases where the fraud has not been so barefaced as that, but which have been almost as bad. These are the cases where a perfectly good insecticidal element is contained in the compound, which has, however, been so diluted as to lose most of its value. Again, a preparation which is effective against a certain insect or a certain group of insects has been misbranded so as to make it appear as a remedy for other insects against which, as a fact, it is perfectly ineffective. Tobacco dust, for example, has been sold from which the nicotine has all been extracted, and kerosene emulsion has been sold as a remedy for the plum curculio.

In fact, the situation with regard to supposed insect-killing mixtures has been worse in its way than the food adulteration conditions which finally brought about the passage of the beneficent pure food law. And the abuse in this case has also brought about the remedy, since Congress in 1910 passed an act preventing the manufacture, sale or transportation of adulterated or misbranded insecticides and fungicides and regulating the traffic in these substances. This act is known as "The Insecticide Act of 1910."

In the main the provisions of this insecticide act are the same as those of the pure food act. They

THE SOUL'S ATLAS

TEXT: "After I have been there, I must also see Rome." Acts 19: 21

THE Bible is the soul's wonder book. It is strangely alive with the outer and the inner, the seen and the unseen, the written and the unwritten, concerning human life and destiny. Its historic content is the treasure of earth's literature. Its symbolism stirs the imagination from deep to height. Its spirituality inspires the whole man. It is unique in its power to arouse the dull, the leaden, the dormant in human nature. Whenever a shaft from the Biblical quiver goes home, there is an instantaneous flash of answering, smoldering fire from within. Sometimes its simplest words abound with mystic suggestiveness. Sometimes its commonplaceness glows with incandescent splendor. Sometimes its unvarnished everydayness becomes a revealing curtain through which the mind passes on into the silent, uncharted realms.

My text is a striking illustration of this phase of our Bible. "After I have been there, I must also see Rome." Could there be a plainer, a more unpretentious statement? It is clearcut, straightforward, definite, prosaic. And yet, when I recall the man behind the words, the calm, purposeful determination they express, the cities involved, the civilization begun, the history made, the heroism displayed, the martyrdom achieved, the passage drops its prosaic matter-of-factness, while its every word begins to sparkle like the facets of a diamond. I seem to perceive in the verse a suggestion of "The Soul's Atlas"—a spiritual geography, a hidden significance, a meaningful symbolism, a chart of the inner journey of the soul from the cities of earth to the City of God.

The Soul's Jerusalem

There is, first of all, the point of departure: "After I have been there." And where is that? Why, Jerusalem—humanity's spiritual capital, the city of the prophets, the city of the Great King, the city where our Lord taught and died and rose again. Before ascending into heaven, he "commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith he, ye have heard of me."

Every soul, then, must have its Jerusalem. Jerusalem stands for the personal downflow of spiritual radiance from the Most High. Life's august calling is to accept "the promise of the Father." This is the first, the supreme, the essential equipment for the journey from Jerusalem to Rome, from existence to life, from glory to glory, from earth to heaven. Until one has attended to this, he has really done nothing, however energetic and varied his activities. He is, at best, only a strenuous failure. On the other hand, the life which opens to the Jerusalem of the Holy Spirit, when measured against the things of time and sense, is a magnificent success.

It is purely a question, I say, of alignment, of accordance with the deeps and heights of being. One may pitch his life on the scale of zero. Our Lord tells us how this is done: "Without me ye can do nothing." Or, a man may key his nature to the music of the inner spheres. Paul tells us how this is done: "I can do all things through Christ, who strengtheneth me." Some of us never make any spiritual music because we have not tarried at Jerusalem. Unlike Paul, we have not definitely "purposed in the spirit" to visit the upper kingdoms of peace, power, and reality. And some of us have been there, but we have forgotten the soulful songs we learned. Our memories are bad because our practice is not good. And some of us are foolishly afraid to test the reality of the invisible things of God. Consequently, we go through life playing a spiritual game of hide and seek, of blindman's buff. We begin each morning with a perhaps. We close each day with a sense of failure. On the lower slopes of life, we talk much of natural selection. But we readily forget that with the coming of God in the flesh, and since his passing into the eternal homelands of the spirit, "the issues of the new order in this world are being shaped more and more by the new force of human choice, and less and less by the old force of natural selection, which men are more and more deflecting and reversing."

I recall just here the words of Goethe: "There seems as it were a presentiment of the whole universe to lie in you, which, by the harmonious touch of poetry, is awakened and unfolded." I count it a great saying, worthy of a great poet and thinker. Only, instead of saying that the presentiment of the universe lying within us is awakened by a touch of poetry, I would say: The awakenment and unfoldment of the cosmic majesty of human life is the direct result of the overshadowing power of the Highest, the harmonious blending of the true inwardnesses of life into the kingdom of God, which is righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit. Oh, believe me, my friends, no soul is equipped for its pilgrimage through the years until it is able to say: "I have been there: I have visited the Jerusalem of the Holy Spirit." If a speck of radium can ring a bell for thirty thousand years, surely the unbroken shine of the Holy Spirit in a soul can make it as deathless as God, as pure as the blood of the Lamb slain from before the foundation of the world.

Closely related to the point of departure is the might of Christian manhood: "After I have been there, I—!" What majesty is packed into that personal pronoun! What reservoirs of power are enclosed therein! Capital I's are sown in Paul's epistles as thick as flower seed in a garden. Yes: there is abundance of egoism here. But it is a transfigured egoism, an egoism that lightens from behind, an egoism as subdued as the afterglow of an October sunset. The lustrous glory of Another beats back of this oft used pronoun, which reveals a shimmer from within. It is said that Matthew Arnold took a childlike pleasure in his own performances. When some one recalled something he had said or written, he would answer: "Did I say that? How good that was!" Similarly, Paul experiences a radiant satisfaction in his noble ministry. But it is all for the sake of his Lord: "It is no longer I that live, but Christ liveth in me."

Here, then, is manhood's true type. Here is the secret of its royal might. Here is the key to its rich and mystical inwardness. We are sweetly ushered into God by the Eternal Son. He is heaven's Pattern Man. He shows us how manhood is to travel the broad, spacious ways of the universe. Clerk Maxwell says that atoms "continue this day as they were created, perfect in number and measure and weight." Yet Nature is not more careful of its type than God is careful of his typal Man. Therefore, manhood's splendid might reaches its coronation in the Christ of God. He is the Way, the Truth, and the Life. And his way is as magnificent as the universe, his truth is as clean and high as the stars, his life is as pure as the shining perfections which stream from the heart of God into the soul of humanity.

It is well, I believe, to insist upon this sublime truth with unflinching accuracy. As truly as the sun is the power-house of earth's energy, so Christ is God's law and life for the soul. If there is scientific fact in the one realm, there is spiritual certitude in the other. Astronomers speak with authority concerning the movements of worlds. Chemists know the result which follows the combination of certain chemicals. Physicists talk with some degree of precision about molecules, atoms, and electrons. We camp in a world of physical law. But we home in a world of spiritual grace. And it is not at all complimentary for us to be more familiar with the utensils of our camp than with the wonders and glories of our home. Yet Christ alone can save us from this mistake. Without him we are easy victims to sight and sense. Oh, what a tragedy is told in these two lines of Emerson:

> Why did all manly gifts in Webster fail?
> He wrote on Nature's grandest brow, For Sale.

One of the most brilliant men Cambridge University gave England was Richard Monckton Milnes. His friend O'Brien one day said to him, almost prophetically: "You are near something very glorious, but you will never reach it." No: the stainless heavens of manhood cannot be reached, except the Christ reign within, man's only hope of glory. Hawthorne believed that "to the untrue man the whole universe is false—it is impalpable—it shrinks to nothing within his grasp." Now, Christ forestalls that awful being named an untrue man. An untrue man may hunt the worlds through without finding standing room. The inviolable order of the universe is forever opposed to him. "How often," Liddon wrote of his mother, "do I think of her words during the last Oxford vacation spent with her: 'You may become a great scholar, but will you become a true Christian?'" A proper answer to that question, my friends, determines the might of our manhood, the queenliness of our womanhood. No man is so gifted but Christ can enrich his gifts a thousandfold. No woman is so ungifted but Christ can impart to her a wealth surpassing rubies and diamonds. Every soul is so made that only Christ can bring it to self-realization. When the human pronoun "I" is agleam with Christ's glory, we behold a radiance like unto that which breaks from the great white throne.

The Way and the Goal

Moreover, there is another clear mark upon our atlas. It is the surge of compulsion: "I must." Here is the confession of a soul in the grip of luminous forces, the ecstasy of a man intoxicated by celestial elixirs, the harmony of a spirit swept by the musical winds of paradise. "I think that the last lesson of life," says a true prophet of the soul, "the choral song which rises from all elements and all angels, is a voluntary obedience, a necessitated freedom." And it is this voluntary obedience, resulting in a necessitated freedom, which surges with compelling awe through Paul's heart. It is the song of a dazzled man, the croon of a soul grown rhythmic and tender, profoundly conscious of

> A deep below the deep,
> And a height beyond the height;
> Our hearing is not hearing,
> And our seeing is not sight.

Now, is it not just this soul-swell of holy constraint, of glorious freedom, of driving compulsion, which is so manifest in those who love Christ? They are magnetized by the spiritual currents he sends through their being. They are good citizens of the universe because they are saints in the flesh. They live as those who are sure that heaven is just over the hills behind the stars. They are divinely possessed souls, and they glory in the holy frenzy with which they have been seized. Paul says: "We preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake." John the Baptist exclaims: "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world." John the Lover declares: "As many as received him, to them he gave the right to become children of God." Peter affirms: "Ye were going astray like sheep; but are now returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls." Thus run only a few strains of the soul-melody responding to the Master's touch. Why, Christians march to the music which makes the music of the spheres. Plato defines the philosopher as "he who has magnificence of mind, and is the spectator of all time and all existence." Yet we only begin to take the measure of a Christian by saying he has magnificence of soul, and is the spectator of both time and eternity, because he is the conscious heir of eternal life, which is the gift of the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. No wonder, then, that this surging, apostolic compulsion, this "I must" of a magnetized soul, survives on and on through the centuries, reminding us that there is still "a musical isle in the river of time."

The surge of compulsion is followed by the broadening vision: "I must see." Oh, what eyes Paul had! I do not mean their color. I do not mean their size. I mean their power of penetration, their breadth of vision, their starward reach, their capacity for seeing in behind the back of things. One man said of another: "He seems to see out of every pore of his skin." It is true of Paul. And where did Paul get his wondrous eyes? Why, from his

APRIL

I.

BIRDS are warbling in the air,
Grass springs verdant at my feet;
Skies are azure, earth is fair;
Oh, in April life is sweet!

Gentle breezes round me playing,
Shower and sunshine as they meet,
Unlocked streamlets—all are saying,
Oh, in April life is sweet!

Gone is winter, like a dream,
Dream how somber, yet how fleet;
Now of heaven we catch a gleam;
Oh, in April life is sweet!

II.

Oh, in April life is solemn!
Earth is damp, and skies are gray;
Winds are chilly, winter threatening
Even to linger till the May.

Oh, the mountain of spring sewing!
Oh, the cares from sun to sun!
Oh, the misery of spring cleaning,
And the work that's never done!

Oh, in April life is solemn!
Long we then for heavenly lands,
For the robes whose fashions change not,
And the house not made with hands.

Master. Sight is the gift of life in Jesus Christ. We never really see until we yield our wills, our brains, our souls to him. He gives us "a glimpse of incomprehensibles, and thoughts of things that thoughts but tenderly touch." We see so little, my friends, because we are so little alive. "Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see—God."

I say perspective, vision, insight is the result of life. And life's inveterate enemy is sin. That is why Paul admonishes the Romans to "reckon ye yourselves to be dead unto sin, but alive unto God in Christ Jesus." We dally with sin, and sin poisons our life. Sin is the brutal Philistine that puts out our eyes. And then we blindly pull down the temple of life in ruins. The strength that should manifest itself in heartening, purifying vision of God is expended in self-destruction. The noted German's last cry was: "Light! Light! Light!" We need not make light our cry at the last. We may make it our deepest possession now, the truth of our inward being, the unfading splendor of our hearts. "Wherefore he saith, Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light." The richly broadening vision does not come with more culture, a nobler philosophy, a modern education. The light of vision flashes when the fountain of life brims. And the vision fades when the stream of life goes dry. And go dry it must, except it be fed from the eternal springs.

Finally, our atlas reveals the pilgrim's goal: "I must see Rome." And what is Rome? Rome is the ultimate circumference of the soul's service on behalf of its Lord. And the finest service the human spirit can render is to be a distributor of life—life in Christ Jesus. Rome is the world—sick, dying, near unto death. Only the winds of eternal life can blow her expiring embers into deathless flame. Rome has had philosophy. Rome has had eloquence. Rome has had poetry. Rome has had law. Rome has had art. And yet Rome is dying, almost dead. But our eyes look away across the blue Mediterranean, on and on to our point of departure, where the immortal journey began, the Jerusalem that is below. And having been there, we glance past the seven-hilled city on the Tiber to "the Jerusalem that is above and is free, which is our mother"—our great white queen-mother that sits beside the crystal sea!

Will you not seek now the Jerusalem of the Holy Spirit? Will you not covet the might of Christian character? Will you not receive Christ's broadening vision? Will you not become a homing pilgrim, with your eyes looking beyond the hills of time's night to the fair morning lands of eternal day?

The Greatest Orchestra

By Eugene Thwing

CULTURED man glories in the modern orchestra. Seeking that ravishment of the senses which may, as Milton said, "dissolve me into ecstasies, and bring all heaven before mine eyes," man has perfected the orchestra. Seeking, even more, an expression of all the joyous, the sad, the peaceful, the tumultuous feelings of the human heart, man has found music to be, as Longfellow pronounced it, "the universal language of mankind"; and, striving to use this language with the fullest freedom and power, he has learned, as H. E. Krehbiel puts it, that "the most eloquent, potent, and capable instrument of music in the world is the modern orchestra."

Only by long and slow development through three centuries has this wonderful instrument come to its present state of perfection. At first a harpsichord, a lute, a theorbo, a lyre, and three flutes constituted an orchestra for the public performance of an opera. Then it was discovered that the various instruments had their own individual peculiarities, and they were more carefully related and combined. A few violins were added. Not until Haydn began his work did the modern orchestra have its real beginning. He directed all his energies to discover and rightly use the true tonal nature of wood-wind instruments. He divided the strings into first and second parts and added several new instruments. Later, Beethoven and Wagner made still further division of the strings, and in Wagner's Tristan the strings are divided into no less than fifteen parts. Now the modern orchestra is composed, often, of more than a hundred instruments, forming, as a whole, says Krehbiel in his chapter on "The Modern Orchestra," "an instrument such as never entered the mind of the wildest dreamer of the last century. Its range of expression is almost infinite. It can strike like a thunderbolt, or murmur like a zephyr. Its voices are multitudinous."

NO COMPOSER of music now is restricted by any lack of medium for expressing the soul that is in him. The voices of the wood-wind and the brass and the strings have been studied long and well to note the kind of melodies and harmonies in which these voices are most effective. From this study an "instrument language" has been evolved. Thus it is found that all the instruments must not be asked to deliver the same message. "A melody conceived for one instrument sometimes becomes utterly unexpressive and unbeautiful by transference to another." This fact does not limit, it extends the range of expression for the composer who is acquainted intimately with each individual instrument.

Without the conductor both orchestra and composer would be helpless. He is the one who unlocks this wonderful instrument and plays upon it whatever he wills. "The modern conductor," says Krehbiel, "is, in a sense not dreamed of a century ago, a mediator between the composer and the audience. He is a virtuoso who plays upon men instead of a key-board, upon a hundred instruments instead of one. Some one must grasp the whole, expound it to the individual factors which make up the performing sum, and provide what is called an interpretation to the public. The conductor has become a person of stupendous power in the culture of to-day."

The great modern orchestras, and the master composers and conductors with their symphonies, their sonatas and their overtures, with their rhapsodies, their fantasias and their serenades, all are giving melody and harmony to the world; but still its turbulence and trouble are not quieted; its longing is not satisfied; its voices are jangling out of tune. The world gathers into its temples of music, pays polite homage to its musicians both living and dead, and goes away unsatisfied into the turmoil and the discord of life. Why?

THERE is a greater orchestra than any recorded in the musical annals. Even the orchestra of 410 instruments used years ago in London for the Handel Festival is insignificant in comparison. In this greatest orchestra are many kinds of "tone color"—many widely differing "string," "wood-wind," and "brass" qualities. The melody suitable for one is unfitted for another, yet all together, rendering in their own appointed parts the wonderful symphony of the greatest composer, and following the hand and eye of the greatest conductor, may produce a mighty and beautiful harmony which will enthrall the world and gladden the hosts of heaven.

By long and slow processes through many times three centuries this greatest orchestra has been developing in the hand of the Master Musician. He has divided the "strings" again and again until the range of expression is beyond conception. This greatest "modern orchestra" can, in very truth, "strike like a thunderbolt, or murmur like a zephyr." Literally "its voices are multitudinous."

God is its author, and not man; he laid
The key-note of all harmonies; he planned
All perfect combinations, and he made
Us so that we could hear and understand.

EVERY man and woman and every child, the world over, is a member of this great orchestra and is assigned a definite part to play in the divine symphony. How sadly some of the parts are out of tune! For thousands of years the orchestra has been studying the great symphony, but many of the performers have given such poor attention and obedience to the Conductor that clashes of discord have spoiled the harmonies.

The Conductor has been very patient, seeking to create a sympathetic relationship between himself and the members of his world orchestra in order that he might the better, "by various devices, imbue them with his thoughts and feelings." Many have responded and yielded themselves gladly to this Great Musician, that he might make with them his sweetest music. They have let their heart-strings vibrate under his touch, exclaiming, "Tune my heart to sing thy praise. Give me the place where I can best help to make melody and joy in the world. I will be faithful and obedient in my own place, no matter how small it may be."

With enough such musicians in his orchestra the Great Conductor can interpret to the world his perfect symphony of life. Then all turbulence will be quieted and all longing satisfied. The whole earth will become a Temple of Music instead of a House of Discord.

THE TRUE REWARD

YOU are the sower! Fear not who shall reap.
Look that the seed shall fall on fertile land.
Think what a splendid faith is yours to keep!
Think what it means a harvest to have planned!
Upon the pains and care with which you sow
Depends to-morrow for its share of grain.
Work on with gladness and with heart aglow;
The harvest time is sure, and sure the gain.

You are the planter! Plant the tree to-day!
That you may never rest beneath its shade
Is not a thought to give your soul dismay.
Do as immortals might, nor be afraid.
See how the land is parched by the sun!
Get to your task and straightway plant the tree.
Be sure the doer and the deed are one,
And all is done for God's eternity.

You are the builder! Build the house with care
Upon a solid rock, with granite walls;
Reck not the cost; no pains or trouble spare;
Strive but to build the House that Never Falls!
Heed not the mocker with his ancient sneer
That life is short. Look up and build with love.
At last the House Immortal you shall rear,
Such as the Master Builder will approve.

You are the fighter! Forward 'gainst the foe!
Ask not if Good be weak or Evil strong.
Trusting the cause to justify the blow,
Advance into the battle with a song.
Be such a fighter as shall never doubt
That the great Chief and Captain of all wars
Shall judge you, when at last you're mustered out,
Not by your decorations but your scars.

Her Happiest Day

THE Mississippi State Legislature not long ago recorded in its minutes a resolution unlike any ever recorded in the records of any other State legislature. This record was as follows:

"Whereas, We have read with great pleasure the following remark of the devoted mother of our esteemed governor, the Hon. Earl Brewer, who, when asked if the day her son was inaugurated governor of the State of Mississippi was not the happiest day of her life, replied: 'I was just as happy when my boy joined the church'; therefore be it

"Resolved, That the above expression be inscribed on our journal as an example to the mothers of our State, and to show our appreciation of this splendid sentiment."

This recognition of a mother's high estimate of the value of her son's public confession of Christ honors the State Legislature of Mississippi. They were the words of a true Christian mother to whom no worldly honor can exceed that of being "a child of the King."

There are thousands of true-hearted Christian mothers who, if asked what was the happiest day they have ever known, would say as this mother said: "When my boy joined the church."

MAKING MEN IN MONTANA

AN OLD pioneer was sitting in a hotel office in Butte, Mont. —the great copper-mining camp of the Rocky Mountains. He had come up from Alder Gulch to attend the annual reunion of the pioneers who had been in the State since '66. He was telling of the great deeds done when Alder Gulch was sending gold and silver out to the world by the millions.

"Yes," said he, "we have sent over $100,000,000 out to the world in gold and silver. Mighty little is left in the Gulch among the people that dug it from the hills or washed it from the creek bottoms. The people are pretty poor over there now. The owners of the railroads, mines and smelters got all the money and are using it to build mansions in New York."

Just here a listener interrupted, "What kind of men and women have you raised over in the Gulch these forty years?"

"I don't like to think of that," answered the old man. "Too many of our boys and girls have turned out bad. Quite a few have been sent down to Deer Lodge to the penitentiary; a good many have died young, complete wrecks from drink or other forms of dissipation. It has been a bad, bad place for boys and girls sure; no influences to encourage them and always something open to drag them down."

"Then it has been pretty expensive giving that $100,000,000 to the world," suggested the listener.

"Yes," continued the pioneer, "the millions that have been made out of copper and gold in the West is really soul money."

This conversation actually took place last summer, and gives some idea of the real conditions as they exist in a hundred mining camps and out-of-the-way settlements in Montana and Wyoming.

Four years ago two brothers, one the president of a denominational college and the other the principal of a county high school in the same Montana city, gave up their positions in order to devote their whole time and energy to the saving of these neglected boys and girls and training them for citizenship.

The brothers' vision was a school on a farm away from the temptations and bad influences of a Western town. Here an ideal environment was to be created. The school buildings, library, church, and industrial shops were to be surrounded by comfortable cottages presided over by cultured house-mothers. Every acre was to yield its utmost and be an object lesson to every student. The income of the farm was to go to the support of the school. Such industries were to be developed as related to the farm and community. All work on the farm, in the shops and around the school was to be done by the students.

When the plan was laid before the people in the region they all wanted a share in making the vision real. With all the hopefulness and big-heartedness which characterizes the people of the far West they rallied around the brothers who had taken up this cause. One said: "For twenty years we have been waiting for some one to help us solve this problem." People in all conditions of life united until there were nearly a thousand contributors and about $100,000 raised.

Then the Billings Polytechnic Institute was incorporated under the laws of the State. Sixty acres of irrigated land was purchased three miles from the city of Billings, a school building and cottages for one hundred students were erected, a water main was dug three miles across the plains to a reservoir built in the bluffs above the school, a heating plant was installed, and five months from the time the ground was broken in the sugar-beet field the school was ready to open.

One girl of eighteen from central Wyoming drove seventy miles across the plains to Sheridan to take her first ride on the train on the way to the Polytechnic. When she enrolled she said, "I am the oldest of seven children. We have saved up fifty dollars for me to go to school with. I am to stay three months and then go home to teach my brothers and sisters what I have learned. Next year another one of us will come up to school. We never had a chance before to learn anything."

A young man twenty years of age rode his pony one hundred and twenty-five miles across the plains,

The Boy That No One Could Manage

sold his pony and saddle for forty-five dollars and came on to the school. He had been to school two or three winters when he was a small boy, but had never attended a religious service or seen a Bible. He was in the school two years and became a good public speaker, ranked high in his classes, was a leader in church work, and very popular with faculty and students.

Last summer when the school was very short of money a fifty-dollar check was received. The director knew of a boy that needed his help in a mining camp in the western part of the State. He took twenty-five dollars of the gift and went to see this boy and made arrangements for his father to pay his expenses for a year. He then went to a hotel and, picking up a local paper, read of a sixteen-year-old boy that was to be sentenced to the penitentiary the next day. He and a band of boys had been implicated in a petty crime, the other boys' parents had paid their share of the damage, but this boy's father was angry and refused to defend him. His mother was dead and he had no friends. The conditions in which he found himself made him very reckless and unmanageable. He had been sent to the reform school, but had been returned. Nothing was left for the judge to do but send him to prison. This was what the newspaper said.

The director decided to investigate. The judge was a sensible, big-hearted man and willing to do anything that he could to help the boy, and had already waited two weeks to see if some way could not be devised to save him from what was worse than death. The judge asked the director to go to the jail and see the boy. The boy was found in a cage with fifty hardened criminals—the past generation of boys who were now lost. There in the midst was the sixteen-year-old boy that had been given up as hopelessly bad.

The boy's father was hunted up and made to promise to clothe the boy and pay a part of his school expenses for one year. The county attorney was persuaded to sign a statement that he would drop the case. The judge then turned the boy over to the director and this boy that no one could manage was free and could come out of that filthy jail under the blue sky again.

The director saw that the boy had a new suit of clothes and was dressed like a young gentleman. That night he ate supper at a good restaurant, went to a good entertainment, slept in a clean bed and had a real friend. Not once did this new friend ask him a question or mention his past. The next day they went to the Polytechnic farms and these directions were given the boy: "Forget the past, just make good, that is all. Every one here is your friend and no one is watching you. Run away if you want to. Look around for a day or two and when you feel like it you may go to work with the other boys; but don't go too hard at first, for you are not used to work."

The boy went to work the third day. He has adjusted himself to the new surroundings and is now one of the very best members of the institution. Here among sympathetic friends and teachers he has found the right environment in which to develop all that is good in his nature. Had that good woman back in New England sent her gift one day later this boy would now have been behind prison bars a hopeless criminal.

THE BURNING OF THE STEAMSHIP "ONTARIO"

WITH a raging fire in her hold, the coastwise liner Ontario of the Merchants' and Miners' Transportation Line, bound from Baltimore to Boston with thirty-one passengers and a large cargo on board, was beached on the Long Island coast near Montauk Point at three o'clock on the morning of April 8. A heavy sea was running at the time, and it seemed as if the landing of the passengers would be almost an impossible task even for a veteran skipper and a well-trained crew. The officers of the Ontario, however, proved their worth, and while the crew worked, not in relays, but every man all the time, to keep the fire as nearly under control as possible, the skipper and his junior officers would now and then leave their posts to reassure the passengers that they were in no immediate danger. At daylight a tug arrived and the passengers were transferred to her, minus most of their baggage, but otherwise safe and sound.

The Chief Officer and Some of the Crew Fighting Fire on Board the "Ontario"

Hubert Ingalls, a wireless operator, still in his teens, whose home is in Lynn, Mass., stood by his key flashing the signal "S. O. S.," the wireless call for help, until the flames reached the wireless house, with the result that the intense heat to which the apparatus was subjected rendered it useless. He stuck to his post as long as the instrument worked.

Captain Bond and his men stayed on the burning ship for about twenty-four hours, fighting the flames, but with little result. Early on the following morning a heavy sea arose, and this, coupled with the intense heat of the fire, drove the crew ashore, and the Ontario was left to her fate.

Cossacks Destroy Persian Temple

BY a recent telegram from Teheran, it is learned that two thousand Russian soldiers at Mashad, Persia, shrine of Imam Riza, the most sacred shrine of the Mohammedans in all Persia, sacked and destroyed the great edifice, and either murdered, wounded, or took prisoner every man in the temple. No place in all the history of the world has been held in more sacred awe by believers than this. Besides the fabulously rich store of rare jewels in the temple, the original writings of Mohammed were kept there, as were also other books of the most ancient literature of Persia. For eleven centuries it has been the Mecca of Mohammedans in Persia. Into its shrine room they have annually poured for more than a thousand years the richest jewels of the Orient as religious offerings. Not until the Cossacks, armed with modern rifles and glittering bayonets, made their unexpected attack in force, had the hallowed ground upon which the famous mosque stands been profaned by the feet of unbelievers. The vaulted dome of the shrine was one of the most wonderful sights in Persia. It was made of turquoise tiles, embellished by a girdle of arabesque inscriptions. The minarets of the porches were embossed with gold, and the blue tile effect was carried out in the façades of the memorial mosques. No act could be more humiliating to the Persians and Moslems throughout the world than this destruction of the sacred shrine. The religious instinct is the deepest, and an injury to it is most keenly resented. This looks like another bloody step Russia is taking in the subjugation of a weaker nation. She can riot in robbery and murder in Persia with less resistance than she had with the Japanese in Manchuria and Korea. This deep injury, following so closely upon the forced removal of Morgan Shuster, who barely got away with his life, may so shock the conscience of England as to compel the leaders to explain what relation England sustains to the proposition to oppress if not absorb Persia. This looting and wrecking of the Persian shrine suggests the robbery, desecration and destruction of the temple at Jerusalem, which called forth this lament:

O God, the heathen are come into thine inheritance; thy holy temple have they defiled; they have laid Jerusalem on heaps. (Ps. 79: 1.)

Government Children's Bureau

THE bill creating a children's bureau in the Department of Commerce and Labor has been passed. The new bureau will be especially charged with investigating infant mortality, the birth rate, orphanage, juvenile courts, desertion, dangerous occupations, accidents and diseases of children, employment, and legislation affecting children in the several States. These data, it is expected, will be of incalculable value to the innumerable humanitarian and sociological agencies. Secretary Nagel, in whose department the new bureau will be, is enthusiastic over the subject of child uplift. "Protection of the child is protection of the State," he said. "Much depends upon the way in which the child is started in the ledger of life, for he is the foundation of the State. If he gets on the debit side he will be a source of trouble for all time, while if he is entered on the credit side he will be a source of progress and substance to the State and nation. What we need on this subject is information." The appropriation with which to begin work will be about $25,000 for the first year. The government has been slow enough in coming to this action. It has busied itself with the seed to be planted in the field, but not much with the beginning of child life; it has concerned itself with cows, but not much with human mothers; with pigs, but not with children, the foundation and hope of the nation. It should be the intention of the State and church to raise up a race of children as free as possible from physical, mental or moral blemish, like the ones the king asked for to be leaders in the realm.

Children in whom was no blemish. (Dan. 1: 4.)

World's Gold Production

THE report of the director of the United States Mint does not usually contain any estimate of the world's gold production, except for the calendar year preceding the fiscal year covered by the report. At the close of 1911, however, George E. Roberts, director of the Mint, made public a preliminary estimate for that year which placed the value of the gold production in 1911 at $466,700,000. Sydney Burton, president of the British Board of Trade, in reply to a parliamentary inquiry, has furnished an estimate which gives the total value for 1911 at £97,274,000, against £96,448,000 in 1910, and £93,376,000 in 1909. The production by countries or geographical divisions is estimated as follows for the past year:

Africa	£39,186,499
United States	19,390,690
Australia	12,549,555
Russia	8,342,751
Mexico	4,006,987
Canada	2,187,609
British India	2,158,470
China	2,054,865
Japan, East Indies, etc.	2,178,157
Central and South America	3,082,297

Gold has been a precious metal in all nations and times. It makes the natural standard of money value in our modern civilization. There is note made of the amount of gold that passed through the hands of the king of the Jewish nation in one year:

Now the weight of gold that came to Solomon in one year was six hundred three score and six talents of gold. (I. Kings 10: 14.)

A Boy Musical Prodigy

A BOY named Solomon, only eight years old, son of a poor East End tailor in London, made his public début in the Albert Hall recently before an immense audience and proved himself a wonderful pianist. It was only a few weeks ago that the boy was discovered, and he had never played on a grand piano before. So marvelous is his talent that a few days ago he played privately before the king and queen at Buckingham Palace. The boy played delightfully Mendelssohn's "Spring Song," Chopin's Valse in C minor, and other pieces. The audience went wild with enthusiasm. What a marvelous musical future this lad promises, and how much sunshine and happiness he may bring to the hearts of his fellow men! How often the evil spirits of the human heart are chased away by song or touches of fingers on musical instruments!

And it came to pass, when the evil spirit from God was upon Saul, that David took a harp, and played with his hand; so Saul was refreshed, and was well, and the evil spirit departed from him. (I. Sam. 16: 23.)

Hummingbird Slippers

PARIS and London fashion papers announce that high-priced footwear, especially for women, will be one of the fads of the season. Women's shoes are advertised in the shops at from $25 to $2,000 a pair. Exhibited in the London shop windows and priced at $2,500 a pair, the highest price known for shoes without diamond or other jewel settings, are shoes made of the breast feathers of hummingbirds. They are produced by a Paris shoemaker who claims that it requires six months' time to complete one. Many hummingbirds are required to make one pair of these ladies' shoes, as the tiny breasts must be stitched together to make a kind of cloth. The effect is very beautiful; the shoe gleams with lines of mingled red and gold. And yet these $2,500 fashionable women's shoes are among the ugliest things in the modern wardrobe, as they represent the wicked waste of a conscienceless wealth, and reflect the red and the blue of the half-frozen feet of the tens of thousands of children—only a few blocks away from the palaces of the wearers—who have no shoes at all when the frosts and the snow come. Such reckless extravagance has had something to do in provoking the discontent with which every nation of Europe is now reckoning, and which has been a significant factor in stirring up the industrial feeling in America about which our statesmen and philanthropists are having so great concern. Our modern tendency to take the common-sense view of things, naturally condemns the extravagance of any one who would wear a $2,500 pair of humming-bird shoes, when a fraction of that sum would buy her a pair that any queen might wear, and with the balance she could buy shoes for one thousand of her poor sisters who live in the same city or even ward, and who are suffering without them. The indiscriminate rebuke of rich people by the pulpit or press is as unjust and wicked as the extravagance that it seeks to condemn. There are rich men and women in all our churches who are pure as gold and true as steel, who loyally support the pastor, who pour out their money like water and their hearts with their money, who co-operate on terms of genuine brotherhood with the humblest ones of the flock, in all the departments of the church work as devoted servants of the common Master. The apostle makes it plain that those who keep their wealth for themselves alone have no right to call themselves Christians.

But whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him? (I. John 3: 17.)

Bottled Light and Heat

A GOVERNMENT chemist at Washington claims to have made a discovery by which he has been enabled to liquify natural gas and furnish light and heat in bottles for use anywhere in any climate at a minimum cost. There are inventions for the transportation of heat on the market, with what success we are not able to say. Intellectual and spiritual light and heat are portable. We take them about with us wherever we go.

Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven. (Matt. 5: 16.)

DO YOU KNOW YOUR BIBLE?

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bible Class is growing with an amazing rapidity. Not only are the answers pouring in in much greater numbers, but a surprisingly large number of students are finding all or nearly all the correct answers. The answers to the third list of Questions are given below:

Correct Answers to List No. 3

1. In whose school did Paul teach for two years? Ans. Tyrannus, Acts 19: 9.
2. Who were the first Christian missionaries and by whom were they sent out? Ans. Barnabas and Saul, Acts 13: 1-4.
3. What man owed his own life and the lives of all his countrymen to a woman? Ans. Mordecai, Esther 3: 8-15; 4: 13, 14; 8: 4-6.
4. What man refused to go to battle unless a certain woman would go also? Ans. Barak, Judges 4: 8, 9.
5. On what three occasions were Peter, James and John with Christ when the other apostles were excluded? Ans. At the raising of Jairus' daughter, Mark 5: 37; Luke 8: 51. At the Transfiguration, Matt. 17: 1; Mark 9: 2; Luke 9: 28. In the Garden of Gethsemane, Matt. 26: 37; Mark 14: 32.
6. Which of our Lord's miracles was wrought by the utterance of one word? Ans. Healing the deaf man. "Ephphatha." Mark 7: 34. (See also miracles recorded in Matt. 8: 32 and 14: 29.)
7. What title did Jesus bear that indicated he was both God and man? Ans. Emmanuel, Matt. 1: 23. (Isa. 7: 14.)
8. Name the only instance in the Bible where the name of a street is mentioned? Ans. "Straight," Acts 9: 11.
9. Where is the Word of God compared to a looking-glass? Ans. James 1: 23.
10. In what passage of Scripture are the angels declared to be fellow workers with mankind? Ans. Rev. 22: 9.
11. Where is the Word of God called milk, and why? Ans. I. Pet. 2: 2, "that ye may grow thereby." (See also I. Cor. 3: 2; Heb. 5: 12.)
12. Who won a wife by capturing a town? Ans. Othniel, Judges 1: 11-13; Josh. 15: 16, 17.

How They Appreciate the Bible Studies

That many hundreds of our readers are finding a keen pleasure in these Bible studies is evident from the tone of their letters. "I made use of the questions before our Mission School (of which I was superintendent)," writes W. A. W., Springfield, Ill., "and found that many did not know their Bible as well as they believed they did. For my own benefit I greatly appreciate this feature of the paper." Mrs. C. A. S., Bridgewater, Mass., writes, "I became so interested in seeking out the answers to the Bible questions that I almost forgot I was ill. Thank you very much for the pleasure." "I am glad to find that I know my Bible," writes Mrs. A. L. B., Everett, Mass. "I am now reading it through for the seventh time in as many years." "I think the Bible Question Class will encourage many to study the Word with greater interest," writes G. G. Klemme, Ia. "It makes one find the Bible a great storehouse of facts," writes Jennie M., Fraser, Ia. A pastor in Tennessee writes: "This is a very interesting Bible study and I wish to be considered a regular member of the class. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is getting better every day." "I like the exercise in Bible research that your questions give. Long may you live to bless the world!" writes S. S., Matthews, N. C. "A grand opportunity for lovers of the Bible to learn more of its beautiful teachings" is the judgment of Mrs. M. L. Y., Brightwood, Va.

Not only the young men and women and the middle-aged, but many very old Christians are members of the Bible Class. We have a number of letters from these old saints, expressing higher appreciation of the studies which make one more familiar with God's precious Word. Old students and young unite in the wish that the class may be a permanent feature in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

One dear lady says she is afraid she has reached the age-limit because she is seventy-two. But there is no age-limit; everybody is young when we begin to study the old Book. Another says: "I am in my seventy-seventh year, and I do love the study of the Bible." This member sends nine correct answers to List No. 3. Another, eighty-one years of age, sends nine correct answers. But her letter is so good we must print more of it: "I am eight-one years old. My eyes are very weak. It is hard to read the questions. I live alone, have no help but the old Bible." The next letter is from a little miss of fourteen, who sends eight correct answers all the way from Texas. A young man of thirteen sends seven correct answers. Another member of the class, who sends eight correct answers, writes: "I am only a young Chinese boy that is learning to be an evangelist for God. May God's blessings be with you or your good works." Amen, young brother from across the sea—and may his blessing be on your work, too, William Tin Soon!

New Questions. List No. 4

1. What victorious warrior was condemned to die because he ate a little honey?
2. Where is the first mention of dining at noon?
3. What young woman, by her civility to a stranger, secured a very desirable husband?
4. Who first promised to give a tenth of all his income to the Lord?
5. Where is the exact count of a catch of fish given?
6. What did Christ seem to fear he should not find when he returned to earth?
7. Where did some one who had died meet a living man and change the whole course of his life?
8. What pedestrian caused a man who was riding to continue his journey in a happier frame of mind?
9. In what verse is the entire Gospel put into eleven words?
10. Mention three passages which emphasize the necessity of the new birth.
11. In what two passages are we told of the wisdom of winning souls and of the reward of the soul-winner?
12. Paul gives a list of nine good things all may possess, and of eight kinds of things that are good to think about; Peter also mentions eight good things which we should all try to obtain. Repeat these lists and tell where they are found.

Directions for Students

For the information of readers who are studying the Bible Questions it should be stated that it is desirable to make the answers as brief as possible. A single word or name and the reference will usually suffice; in many cases the reference alone is answer enough. All answers should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bible Question Class within two weeks from time the questions appear. List No. 1 was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 17, 1912; List No. 2 on February 21, 1912; and List No. 3 on March 20, 1912.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—DESPATCHES FROM GYANGTSE, Tibet, say that the Chinese have established a Representative Council at Lhasa, and have proclaimed a republic. The officials have cut off their queues, and some of them are wearing silk hats and frock coats. The Tibetans oppose the change, and are threatening to exterminate the Chinese. Fighting has occurred near Shigatse, 130 miles from Lhasa.

—PROFFERS OF HELP FROM many quarters by those who wished to aid the Mississippi flood sufferers met with the uniform reply that Kentucky and the other States affected were taking care of their own. The State governments were prompt and generous in their efforts for the safety and comfort of the sufferers, from Cairo to Memphis. In addition, the Federal Government has sent large supplies of tents, etc. The floods have reached their maximum and are now declining, but it will be many weeks before normal conditions can be restored.

—MUNIFICENT BEQUESTS TO hospitals, accompanied by the declaration that "I don't wish that my name should be in any way associated with these sums in the future," are the feature of Lord Lister's will, which was filed for probate in London April 4. He bequeathed £10,000 ($50,000) each to four London hospitals and double that amount to the Lister Institute of Preventive Medicine. To the University of Edinburgh he left the insignia of the Prussian Order of Merit and the English Order of Merit, and all his medals, diplomas, honorary gifts, and distinctions.

—IF YOU HAVE NOT already sent in your gift to the China Famine Orphan Fund, send it to-day. There are several hundred of these little ones who need to be supported under the care of our faithful missionaries. Twenty dollars will maintain an orphan a whole year, including shelter, clothing, teaching and training at a Christian mission. Even the smallest contribution will be welcomed. Send for our free booklet, Little Moonflower. A postal to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will bring copies for yourself and as many of your friends as you may wish to interest in this good cause.

—THOUSANDS OF PERSONS have been killed and whole Indian villages swept away by the eruption of Chiriqui Peak, near Bocas del Toro, in Panama, according to the story of Captain Olsvik, of the United Fruit steamer Fort Morgan, which arrived in Mobile, Ala., on April 11. Captain Olsvik says the eruption occurred on April 5, early in the morning, while the Fort Morgan was berthed near Bocas del Toro, and that he witnessed flames shooting from the peak. Reports of the large casualty list were brought to Bocas del Toro by refugees, who escaped the onrushing lava. He says he watched the eruption on April 5 until he put to sea. Chiriqui Peak, as far as is known, never has shown volcanic activity, and the sudden bursting of fire and lava from the crest, it is supposed, took the inhabitants of the village by surprise.

—W. MORGAN SHUSTER, former treasurer general of Persia, has been chosen by the National City Bank interests of New York to represent them in South America. The bank is not permitted to do business outside the country, but the National City Company was formed last year by stockholders in the bank to handle such business as conflicted with the National charter. News of Mr. Shuster's appointment was confirmed by President Vanderlip of the National City Bank, who said that Mr. Shuster would go to South America in May, and meanwhile would find enough to keep him busy in New York and Washington. He has had a broad training in financial matters in the government service, but is less familiar with banking and will need a month to get in touch with the company's policies. Mr. Shuster will have a roving commission which will give him the continent as his field.

—PROSPECTS OF PEACE, with an early resumption of anthracite mining, were reported much brighter on April 10 after the miners and the operators in conference in Philadelphia decided to sit down together and talk over their differences. When the negotiations, broken off on March 15, were resumed in the Reading terminal that afternoon, George F. Baer, president of the Reading Company, proposed on behalf of the operators to arbitrate their differences; that is, to let the anthracite coal strike commission which settled the strike of 1902 investigate present conditions and decide whether any modification of the commission's award is necessary at this time. In the discussion that followed the miners practically threw this offer aside, and the conference finally agreed to appoint sub-committees to take up the demands of the miners, with power to make recommendations for adjustments. The sub-committees were immediately appointed, and after a brief joint session they adjourned. In naming the sub-committee of operators George F. Baer, representing the largest individual operator in the anthracite field, was not included. It is believed that the elimination of Mr. Baer from the sub-committee was in the interests of harmony, and will go a long way toward settling the dispute between the miners and operators.

POT-BOILERS

BY PEARL FRANKLIN GODFREY

CALLIE, standing at the table in the pantry window, skimming the cream for breakfast, noted how high the sun had risen above Ompawaug Hill, and waited for a certain sound from the road beyond the lilac hedge. When it came it was that of a rattling vehicle and now and then a horse's hoof as it struck a stone in the soft sand. She hurriedly finished her task and went into the kitchen.

"Mr. Wardle is coming, Jessie," she said to the country girl who hovered over the range; "you can ring the first bell and get the muffins in; we'll have breakfast in half an hour. I'll be back in time to fix Miss Ellers' tray and carry mother's in to her." Then she sped out through the vine-covered door of the little white farmhouse and around to the old red barn.

When the driver saw Callie he called to her and waved his hand. He was a small man, with round, pink-cheeked face, dancing blue eyes, white moustache and hair, and had on an alpaca suit, worn shabby, and a sunburned straw hat. Pinned on his coat lapel was a spray of pink laurel; from the whip socket protruded an entire branch of it; and even the steed, once white, now gray with age, had a bit of the green stuck rakishly through the harness above his head.

The old horse was taking advantage, as usual. He knew there would be neither check nor whip, so his head hung almost to the ground, and his feet dragged in the manner of a spoiled child. When Callie stepped into the path, he came to a standstill, lazily nuzzling her apron pocket.

Just above the enveloping checked apron gleamed a bit of Callie's pink dress—enough to emphasize the creamy whiteness of her neck, the flush of her cheeks, the blue-black of her hair and eyes. Mr. Wardle bent his head so that he could look out at her over his glasses, and into his eyes came the same joy as when he looked at flowers.

"I beat you this morning," he boasted gleefully, letting the lines slide out of his hands. He pushed the straw hat back from his broad forehead and leaned over to take the laurel out of the socket.

"This is for your mother," he said. "Tell her it's the first out. I got it back of the old farm on Lonetown Road. No, I didn't forget to mail Horton's letters. Yes, I got the grapefruit for Miss Ellers' breakfast, and there's a bag of corn for you young folks to pop in front of the grate fire these cool evenings—but you can't guess what else I've got—you couldn't in a hundred years."

From beneath the seat of the dilapidated buggy Mr. Wardle brought forth a paper pinwheel—pink, blue and yellow—and a red balloon. He held them up exultantly. His eyes shone.

"Callie, do you know, I can't tell you when I'd seen a man with a basket of these paper pinwheels and his hand full of these here balloons all tied together and floating in the air. This fellow was going to the early train with them, for the fair at Longfield, and I turned and drove after him three blocks before I caught him; just look!" He floated the balloon at the end of its string and swept the pinwheel through the air to make it revolve.

"But what are you going to do with them?" laughed Callie, whose hands were deftly busied with the harness. "There isn't any child to give them to. I hope you're not thinking of Roy, when he's just home from college."

"Never mind, Callie," chuckled Mr. Wardle, "they're not for Roy. The balloon I'm going to tie to the railing on the porch outside your mother's window, and the pinwheel I'll stick up there too, where she can see it go round. That's the kind of things I'd want, Callie, if I was sick—if I'd sprained my ankle. There," he cried suddenly, "you've got that nag unhitched while I've sat here gabbing away. Well, it's too late now. But just look, Callie," he chattered as he descended a little stiffly from the old rig. "Look here at all the ideas I got this morning for things to write about—all these!" From the sagging pockets of his coat Mr. Wardle produced a handful of scraps torn from the paper bags in which his purchases had been wrapped. These were scribbled over in signs unintelligible and yet familiar to the girl.

"Why, I'll have three stories out of just this one trip to town; see if I don't!" he nodded brightly, as he took the horse's bridle and started to lead him toward the barn.

Going back to the house to resume her duties, Callie found the doorway blocked by a tall, serious young man who smilingly held out both hands.

"Callie," he called, tenderly. The girl roguishly shifted the bulky bags into his outstretched arms, then put her hands, with the laurel, on top, and they stood looking, she up into his eyes, he down into hers.

"It's so good to see you—it seemed years," he said.

"Well, well, well!" cried Mr. Wardle, coming up the path. "So early in the morning!" He encircled them with a passing hug, then hurried on with his windmill and balloon.

Roy looked after his father a little uneasily. "I wish—dad wouldn't," he said.

"Wouldn't what?" asked Callie.

"Oh, do such funny things—bring home that truck—they think he's so queer."

Together they went into the dining-room. Callie passed the packages through the kitchen slide, with some instructions to the girl, then took a low dish for the table and a larger one for her mother's room, and began to arrange the flowers at a side table.

"Why, Roy," she said, a little wonderingly, "we all understand your father. He and you have been coming up here every summer for ten years—ever since we were children. Mother and I hardly feel that we have our home together till summer comes and brings you back again, and there isn't a man, woman or child in the village or for miles around who doesn't know and love him. If you'd see the way they keep asking, and waiting for him to come back—"

"I know all that," said Roy, sinking into the chair in the bow window and plunging his hands into his pockets, "it's the same way everywhere—every one loves dad. How can they help it? It's not dad himself that I mean—"

Just then, from a side room came the clatter of a typewriter loosely geared and speeding as in the throes of a mighty inspiration. The young man nodded his head toward the sound.

"It's that," he said, biting his lips in a worried way; "they don't know what to make of it. You know, Alfred and Miss Ellers are real artists. I'd never told Alf any more than that father wrote—and of course I didn't know Miss Ellers until last night when we came up. But dad didn't make any bones about starting right in, telling them all about it—his hints to farmers for the Farm Courier, and all that hack work by the column for the newspapers, and those silly stories for the Household Review. Oh, I know, of course, it's all right, Cal, but I wish he wouldn't talk about it to Alf and Miss Ellers. They can't understand his viewpoint—and he can't understand theirs."

"What have they done, Roy?" You hadn't told me," said the girl, bending over the flowers so that he could see only the dark lashes of her eyes and her lips pressed firmly together.

Roy shifted a bit. "Done? Why, I can't just say what they've done, Callie—it's what they're going to do. They're the sort that would rather wait until the public grows up to their ideals than to lower their ideals to suit the public. Miss Ellers is planning a big thing—a book. Alf says it may take years, but she's the sort would rather starve—"

"She has beautiful clothes—she seems far from starving," suggested Callie softly.

"Oh, well, she's got a family, of course—the sort with plenty of money but with no brains—absolutely no understanding of genius—they get on her nerves so that she has to get away—"

"And—Mr. Horton?" Callie reminded him.

"Oh, Alfred? He's going to write poetry, but not the kind you can grind out or hurry. He's going to travel abroad for a year or so before he starts in; he's like Miss Ellers—rather starve than do hack work. You see, they're used to mixing only with highbrows."

"Why do they come here—to our little out-of-the-way farm?" asked Callie, a bit resentfully.

"I'd been raving so to Alf about it at school," Roy confessed, "and he thought Miss Ellers would like it, so they came with me last night. But I didn't think dad would start in on them at the supper table. Why, I can see them fairly squirm when he mentions Farm Courier and Household Review."

"And who," asked Callie irrelevantly, "takes care of Alfred while he is getting ready to do big things?"

"Oh, Alf has a brother in business in Chicago. But don't say anything—it makes him sore. His brother is one of the grubbing kind—all business; always got his nose to the grindstone."

"Maybe he has to, Roy," said Callie, thoughtfully, as she placed the flowers on the table and went quickly about the room, doing other things.

Roy shook his head. "Not at all—he's just that kind, Callie. People in this world do what they're fitted to do; if they're made to grub, they'll grub. If they're made to soar, they'll soar. I don't mean to say Dad's made to grub. I've never found any one with a better mind than dad, but it's different with him, he just never wanted to do anything different. Callie, I hadn't told

Sealy Sleepers Are Sound Sleepers

It's one thing to sleep and another to sleep soundly. And how soundly you sleep has a lot to do with how well you keep. Everything about the Sealy Mattress contributes to sound, healthful slumber. Unlike the ordinary mattress, it has no tufts without to make hills and hollows and no layers within to work out of place and become bunchy and lumpy. Unlike mattresses made of linters, mill-waste or the hair of animals, the Sealy harbors no dirt or germs in its filling to breed disease.

SEALY

Tuftless Mattress

No Tufts—No Layers

The Sealy is made like a pillow—absolutely smooth inside and out. It is filled with virgin cotton—the purest, cleanest and softest that grows—picked fresh and pneumatically formed into one big, restful billow—a buoyant, undulating bed that instantly conforms to every movement of the body.

The Sealy is positively guaranteed all pure cotton; positively guaranteed to give twenty years of satisfaction; positively guaranteed to prove, in a sixty nights' trial, the best mattress you ever used, or your money back.

Write for booklet, "The Real Difference in Mattresses" and "The Mattress Museum," together with the name of the nearest Sealy Merchant. If you haven't a dealer in your immediate vicinity, we will see that you are supplied.

you, I've read a few little things of my own to Alf, and he says if I just stick to my ideals, it may be years, but I'll do something worth while."

"And how," asked Callie, a little breathlessly, "would you—would we—get along in the meantime?"

"Why," said Roy, "we'd go right on with the chicken farm. Father will lend us the money just the same. The chickens will take care of us," he assured her, then held out his arms.

But just then the country girl came out of the kitchen and, bestowing upon them a genial and widespread grin, passed into the hall to ring the breakfast bell. Immediately a door above was opened and quick steps descended the stairs.

A blond youth in light suit, careful linen and cravat hurried into the room and took his place at table, greeting Roy and Callie as he did so. He did not appear to notice the girl who waited on the table, and when Mr. Wardle came cheerily in, he barely nodded, not looking up. His attention was given to the delicious breakfast of farm produce, to which he helped himself liberally, gathering the platters and dishes about his plate.

Mr. Wardle spoke kindly to the girl when she gave him his coffee, but did not taste it until he had helped Callie with her tray.

"Do you know, I hadn't seen one of those fellows with pinwheels and balloons in—well, I can't tell you how long—no, sir," he babbled, as he began to eat, unconscious of his son's discomfort and young Horton's lack of interest.

"Miss Ellers is not in her room," said Callie, returning with the tray. "She said that she would not get up until ten. She must have changed her mind."

"Mother is sleeping well, thank you," she replied to Mr. Wardle. "Her ankle is much better."

"Oh, yes, how is she?" asked young Horton, tardily solicitous.

Just then steps were heard on the porch and Miss Ellers, a young woman who had everything to make for a good appearance save a clear complexion and the buoyancy of health, entered the room and, with an air of condescension, took her place.

"I went up with your coffee and wondered where you were," said Callie from the end of the table where she sat in her fresh pink gingham, a small white apron replacing the one of checks.

"I have been up on the hill," said Miss Ellers, addressing herself to the two young men. "It's perfectly delightful. I went up on top where the big boulders are and came to a grave with a chain about it. I knew at once it must belong to some old settler who died fighting the Indians, and I sat down and had the loveliest inspiration. I was so glad I had my notebook. It was wonderful the way I felt the presence—"

"A grave with a chain about it?" repeated Callie, politely. Then, as Miss Ellers assented with a lofty nod, it seemed as though the girl bending over the coffee cups had smiled, although her lips remained shut and serious. In that particular grave the town's prosperous butcher had been buried the year before.

"It was wonderful," sighed Miss Ellers to Mr. Horton, as she followed his example, helping herself to everything, then allowing the dishes to accumulate about her plate. "What I wrote reminded me of Carl Carolus Carlin—of course, you must have heard of him. Harold Haynes, who comes up to my studio, is going to bring him up. There is genius—real genius. Oh, New York is the place," said she with the proprietary air of New York's floating population, "where you meet people—real people, I mean—ones who are doing things."

Mr. Wardle held up one of the browned muffins. "Now, I want to know," he demanded mildly, beaming upon them all, "if that's not doing things—making a muffin that looks like that and fairly melts in your mouth."

Miss Ellers and Mr. Horton stopped to stare, then exchanged a significant glance and continued to eat—muffins. Roy looked from them to his father and Callie and his face was irresolute. Mr. Wardle went on to make matters worse.

"Come here, Jessie," he called to the girl, who, suffused with blushes at this praise before strangers, was retreating to the kitchen. Miss Ellers and Mr. Horton collected more dishes about their plates and tried not to bear witness to such shocking manners.

"Jessie," said Mr. Wardle to the girl, who stood bashfully awaiting his message, "I should think you'd be wanting to go to that fair to-day at Longfield. I saw a nice young man getting on the early train, and lots of folks you know will be on the noon. Why don't you let her go, Callie?" he demanded. "We can take care of ourselves just as well as now, can't we?"

"I didn't like to ask Miss Callie with her ma laid up this way," stammered Jessie, flushed with the prospect now shaping itself.

"Of course you can go—I'll get along," said Callie, gladly.

"Why, sure," Roy agreed, boyishly. "It'll be something of a lark, all pitching in and waiting on ourselves. Don't do any regular cooking, Callie; make every one go out and get his own supper. I'm game. It'll be great fun, won't it?" he appealed to the others.

Young Horton smiled politely but did not respond. Miss Ellers looked up disinterestedly. "I never cooked a meal in my life," she said, languidly. "I wouldn't know how, I'm sure."

"So much the better," replied Roy heartily. "It'll be more fun for you to learn and for us to teach you. Go ahead, Jessie," he urged the girl; "we'll get along."

Miss Ellers and young Horton got up from the table and strolled away in the direction of the hills, taking three books of poetry from Horton's suit case, a box of candy from Miss Ellers's, and a quantity of fruit from the sideboard. Mr. Wardle bustled about the house for a while, doing chores, then shut his door, and the furious click of the typewriter was resumed. Roy went out to look after the horse and chickens, and to make drawings for some chicken houses he had planned. Callie—but nobody could count the many things Callie was doing.

Jessie ran noisily about the house, doing double her share of the work in her gratitude for the holiday.

"That Mr. Wardle, I just love him," she burst forth to the little gray-haired woman in the front bedroom, who sat with her ankle propped up on a chair. Callie's mother, thus addressed, was looking out the window, laughing at the curious antics of a paper windmill and a toy balloon.

"I know," she said, "he's always like that—thinking of others. I don't know what we'd have done without him these ten years, since his wife died and he's been coming here. And it's not only us he's good to; every one's God-blessin' Sammy Wardle."

Arrayed in all her finery, Jessie departed for the fair, but not until she had spread the table with a delicious noonday meal. Miss Ellers and Mr. Horton arrived from their morning on the hill, an hour late. They did not apologize, but sat down and began to eat greedily, while Callie waited on them pleasantly and Roy lay, knitting his brows, in the window chair. After they had finished, while Callie waited to clear the table and get through with the work, they sat on, oblivious, until they were quite talked out.

POT-BOILERS

Roy called to them as they were aving. "Don't forget," he said, we're going to get our own supper -night; every one pitch in. Be here y five, won't you?" Miss Ellers alked out into the hall, smiling. oung Horton mumbled something nd followed.

The typewriter clicked busily all fternoon. Roy, having helped Callie ith the dishes, drove to town to get rices on the chicken houses.

"I wouldn't think of letting them elp with supper," laughed Callie to er mother when she went in later to ress the sprained ankle. "Of course, was just like Roy and his father to uggest it, but I have salad ready to ix, cake ready to frost, and some new ottage cheese. There'll be enough—nd it will be all ready as a surprise."

But Callie was the one to be surrised. In the middle of the afteroon Miss Ellers and her escort reurned from the hill and their air was xtremely bored.

"We're having to leave on that five rain," young Horton explained hurriedly, as Callie met them in the hall. If you'll just telephone for the stage o come and get us—Miss Ellers must et back to town. You see, she's not sed to the quiet like this, and—and 'll just go back with her."

An hour before train time they were eady, with their suit cases, on the litle porch, watching the stage crawl up he long sandy road from the village. Callie waited to see them off, for Roy ad not returned.

"Isn't it odd?" remarked Miss Ellers anguidly to young Horton, as she ooked at the red balloon and the pinwheel flying crazily in the light breeze.

"Who would have thought Roy could e so careless in picking out a father?" aid Horton, smartly. "I simply can't et over it. Why, at school, really oy was very well thought of; but that ld fossil in there—"

They paused to listen to the noisy latter from the room beyond the hall. Miss Ellers laughed.

"A serial for the Household Review! t must be a thriller," she said.

"Maybe it's for the Farm Courier," supplemented young Horton. That was very funny, for they were almost hysterical when the stage drew up to the door.

"You'll explain to Roy," said Mr. Horton to Callie, as he put Miss Ellers into the stage.

"Certainly," replied Callie, and she meant it.

"They didn't say good-by to any one," Callie told her mother. "I don't believe they knew there was any one here besides themselves. Oh, mother, I don't know anything about writing—I'd never be half clever enough; but I'd never want to if I had to become so disagreeable and selfish that every one would stop loving me."

At the supper table she and Roy sat constrained; they had been having a talk and Roy's face was thoughtful. But Mr. Wardle babbled on quite as usual, full of praises for the salad, the cake, the light biscuits, and most of all for their maker.

It was not until they had gone into the living-room to sit before the fire, after Roy and his father had cleared the table and, in their bungling way, had done the dishes, while Callie fixed her mother for the night, that Mr. Wardle spoke of the departed guests.

"So your friends decided to go back, Roy?" he said; then sat and pondered awhile. "They want to do great things," he said, kindly, "and God help them—I hope they may—I hope they may—"

"There's nothing like having high ideals, then going ahead to realize them in spite of everything," said Roy, slipping down to the floor at Callie's feet and possessing himself of her hand.

Mr. Wardle sat back in a large chair—he seemed very small for it—and folded his hands and looked into the fire.

"I was just like that; just like that," he assured them cheerily, "when I came out of school. That's the way I talked about Art and Ideals and how I'd never do anything short of the best."

Roy looked up quickly. "You, father? Why, you never told me—you never said—"

"I can't remember your ever asking me—and I had almost forgotten," said his father, as one recalling a dream, "until you spoke as you did just then. That brought it all back in a flash. It was the way I spoke once, only now it seems like some one else. I have changed, maybe."

"But if you felt that way about it, how could you? What made you change?" burst forth Roy, impatiently.

His father regarded the fire almost vacantly. "Life," he said. "Life got hold of me. I've been kept busy ever since—haven't had time to stop."

"You've been going on to—to keep me in school—to put aside this money you're going to let Callie and me have for a chicken farm," said Roy, in an accusing voice, after a pause.

His father waved his hand lightly. "You talk as though I had been giving up something," he said.

"You have," cried Roy; "you've given up your ideals."

His father stopped him. "Ideals? Who? What ideals? No, I guess they've just changed," he said. "I must've grown lazy and let 'em slump. All I care for is to see folks happy; to look into hearts—warm hearts—and keep my own warm."

"Aren't those ideals?" asked Callie, looking up. She too had slipped down on the floor beside Roy and, hand in hand, they sat in wonderment.

"Oh, that's just Life," said the old man, simply. "I was trying to think what I'd done with my ideals in Art. I'm afraid I've just gone along doing pot-boilers and lost track."

"Pot-boilers?" repeated Callie, leaning forward bewildered; "what's that?"

Mr. Wardle seemed to have forgotten her question.

"Roy has a fine talent for writing—a fine talent," said he slowly, after a pause; "but when you children are married, suppose chickens don't always pay and there are hard times. Suppose you have some one else to think for. Suppose there's no coal and it's bitter cold. Suppose you're hungry and the cupboard's bare; suppose you're sick and there's no money for the doctor, no money for the rent, no money for clothes. Suppose Roy had all this to face and he didn't know how to do anything but write?"

"Then he'd write!" cried Callie loyally.

"But it would have to be something that would sell right off," Mr. Wardle told her, a little tremulously. "You couldn't wait for your pay. You couldn't wait to write something great. And perhaps Roy wouldn't want to write anything else."

"Want—nonsense!" cried Roy, holding both Callie's hands tightly in his. "Do you think I'd care about anything else, if my wife—if my—don't you think I'd be man enough to take care of my family?" he asked, bitterly.

"But what of Fame and—and your friends?" suggested his father, almost timidly.

"Fame be hanged!" cried Roy, with passionate earnestness. "My world would be Callie—taking care of her, making her happy, being happy with her. I wouldn't care what I wrote—how to feed chickens—how to grow feed—I'd write any old thing!" He stopped, unable to go on.

"Yes," said the little man, leaning back as though satisfied, nodding his head rapidly and widening his glistening eyes to stare into the dying fire. "You're not going to have to write 'any old thing,' my boy. But if he did, Callie," he added, with a return of his light-hearted chuckle, "that is what you'd call Pot-boilers."

What Nature Has Put in the Grape

MOST luscious and delicious of all fruits, Nature has given the grape wonderful health qualities—qualities which build up the blood, yield energy, aid digestion, increase appetite. The famous foreign grape "cures" have proved this long ago. But there are simpler ways to enjoy these benefits.

Armour's Grape Juice

Bottled Where the Best Grapes Grow

Made from the finest Concord grapes grown. Armour's Grape Juice preserves every tonic and health-giving quality of the fresh fruit in an undiluted and delightful form.

The Armour factories, located in the hearts of the great New York and Michigan grape-growing districts, secure the cream of each season's crop.

Not sweetening or diluting. Preservation entirely by sterilization and air-tight bottling.

Drunk with meals and between meals, you not only enjoy the most refreshing and delicious of all beverages, you are storing up energy and vitality, putting color in your cheeks, new life in your step.

ARMOUR'S GRAPE JUICE is sold by grocers and druggists, at fountains, buffets and clubs. It is the great family drink—for health and pleasure combined.

If your dealer cannot supply you with Armour's, we will send you a trial dozen pints for $3, express prepaid east of Omaha. Address Armour and Company, Dept. 131, Chicago.

More Mayors on the "Open Market"

EXECUTIVES OF MANY AMERICAN CITIES ADVOCATE IT AS A REMEDY FOR HIGH PRICES

The Leaders of New York's Housewives' League, at Washington Market

MANY readers of this journal, and others who are not regular readers but who have become deeply interested in the mayoral discussion of the Open Market as an aid to solving the problem of high prices, have written in hearty endorsement of the plan. In this issue we give a third instalment of the letters received from different mayors throughout the country. Without a single exception, they favor the open market. Some have already adopted it; others are now arranging to do so.

Mayor Gaynor of New York supplements his recent letter by a special interview which will be found a timely and suggestive contribution to the literature of the "high prices" controversy which is now engrossing public attention.

"The great reason for high prices is the enormous output of gold," said Mayor Gaynor. "Since 1883 the gold output has been going up, year after year, until now it is so tremendous —about $500,000,000 a year—that nothing like it was ever known. The output since 1883 reaches the vast total of $7,000,000,000, and the time when this will decline is not yet in sight. But it will finally reach the top of the apex, and will just pass over and begin to drop down the other side, and prices will drop with it, and then—well, then, I have no desire to be around.

"Things are a great deal better than when I was a boy," he continued. We had hard times enough then. Prices were not high—I can tell you that much. Our sources of income were very few. Except for the tubs of butter that we sold in the fall through the middleman who came around to buy, we did not receive much money. Nor could we afford to drink anything but skimmed milk. And we didn't eat the eggs either; we brought them down to the village and exchanged them for something else."

"What about the middleman and the high prices to the consumer—is he not responsible for much of the trouble?"

"Well, I know no way to abolish this terrible middleman. They say he is getting rich, that his profits are enormous, but I have a notion that supply and demand will bring about a right result."

"What about the open market? Is the middleman a necessity?" he was asked.

"Well, if the people want their supplies direct from the farmer, and the latter is anxious to do away with the middleman's profits and get some of them for himself, he has got to go down to the city or send his son; he has got to send a team and a wagon to carry the stuff. Then if he has got some left over he must hire a place to keep it; he has got to pay rent. After a little he will have to hire help also and erect a cold storage to keep his left-over produce, and I'm afraid all this work and expense would be quite beyond him. But it must be done by somebody. When the produce of the farm comes into the cities, it has to be received and to be stored, and we must get our distributive share of it at our basement doors the next morning. I have no objection to the farmers coming to the city with their supplies, but their coming won't solve the problem. A movement, however, might be made and become effective by which the farmers could establish their own agencies or their own middlemen in the city of New York and other cities, but whether they would do any better, or the people be more benefited, than through the middlemen I do not know."

"What about the trusts? What effect have these combinations and corporations on the issue under discussion?"

"Now, they say that the trusts can run the buying price from the farmer or producer of the raw material down just as low as they see fit. Can they? Just as soon as they run it down below what the farmer or producer can produce it for at a profit, and live, the farmer or producer ceases to produce that article, doesn't he? Nor can the trust raise the price to the consumer as high as it sees fit. The economic law regulating these things is fixed and inevitable. If the trust raises its price too high, people stop buying that commodity, or they buy a quarter less, or a third less, or a half less, so that the sale falls off immediately, and the seller has to cut his price in order to sell.

"We shall regulate them in due time," he said in conclusion. "We cannot do it all at once, but we shall do it eventually, and do it well."

AMERICAN TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO. AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES — BELL SYSTEM — ONE POLICY, ONE SYSTEM, UNIVERSAL SERVICE — LOCAL AND LONG DISTANCE TELEPHONE

The Pony Express

A Pioneer of the Bell System

FIFTY years ago the Pony Express became the most efficient messenger service ever known.

Pony riders carried messages from Missouri to California, nearly two thousand miles across mountains and deserts, through blizzards and sand storms, constantly in danger of attack by hostile Indians.

Fresh horses were supplied at short intervals, and the messages, relayed from rider to rider, were delivered in the record-breaking time of seven and one-half days.

Railroad and telegraph took the place of the Pony Express, carrying messages across this western territory. Today the telephone lines of the Bell System have done more, for they have bound together ranch and mine and camp and village.

This network of telephone lines, following the trails of the Indians, connects with the telegraph to carry messages throughout the world.

By means of Universal Bell Service the most remote settler is no longer isolated, but has become a constantly informed citizen of the American Commonwealth.

How Spokane's Mayor Deals with the "High Prices" Problem

THE general condition which confronts the average city of 100,000 people or more is:

(a) A large number of people who are unable to purchase the products of farm, orchard and garden for the use of their families on account of the high prices.

(b) A group of commission men who control the market both as to the price paid to the producer and the charge made to the consumer, in some instances carrying this control so far as to buy at carloads of fruit have been sent to the crematory rather than put on the market under conditions which would lower the price.

(c) The producers with large crops of perishable products are forced to accept prices which scarcely cover the expense of marketing or else allow the products to rot on the ground.

In order to remedy this vicious practice and ameliorate the conditions of the common people, the open market has provided a common meeting-place for producer and consumer, the city acting as the middleman without profit or charge other than a nominal fee, exacted to meet the cost of maintenance.

Spokane has one public market where eight feet of space is allotted for 25 cents for one day, $1 for one week, or $3 for one month; and while two private markets are in operation, their activities are confined largely to stalls and booths where produce can be sold, but they provide no facility for farmers' teams or hucksters' wagons on the outside.

The principle of the open market is unquestionably one of the great factors in reducing the high cost of living, and with proper supervision on the part of the city and loyal patronage on the part of citizens, will prove itself a source of unqualified satisfaction.

W. J. HINDLEY, Mayor.
Spokane, Wash.

San Antonio Has a Well-Conducted and Successful Open Market

AN OPEN market has been established for many years in this city. At this market, farmers and producers are assigned stands by a man in authority who collects for each wagon occupying a stand, a charge of ten cents per day. For this small fee, the truck-grower or farmer is permitted to expose what he may have to offer, from four to ten o'clock A.M., and from four to seven o'clock P.M. In fact, our market is conducted along the lines indicated in Sections 1, 3, 4 and 5 of your favor. FRED FRIES,
San Antonio, Texas. City Clerk.

Kalamazoo's Mayor Tells About the Experimental Open Market

KALAMAZOO, like every other live city, is interested in any rational attempt to solve the problem of the high cost of living, if indeed there is any solution of it. Personally, I do not believe that the middleman will be eliminated. I believe he is a necessary factor in our internal commerce, and will remain. However, I do believe that there should be legislation, both State and municipal, regulating his activities.

After listening to Mayor Shank, I am not convinced that the city should attempt to bring the buyer and seller together through its own purchasing agent, for I fear that evils equally as bad as those charged against the present system may arise. Neither do I believe with him that we should attempt to lessen the number of retail dealers either by legislation or municipal competition.

Last year, Kalamazoo set aside one street for a public market, allowing the farmers and gardeners to display their wares for sale under proper regulation without any charge whatever. The experiment was highly successful, and will be repeated this year, perhaps, on a larger scale. We believe a market house would extend the advantages of the market. One thing, however, must be noted, and that is: without any attempt on the part of the municipality to direct it, the market became practically a wholesale one, almost none of our citizens availing themselves of the privilege to go there to make purchases direct from the producer.

The market idea is a new one in this city, and will need some direction in order to make it develop along right lines. It is an undoubted convenience to the producer and to the merchant, and might be of much use to the consumer, but whether it will ever offer a solution for the high cost of living or not, is to me problematical.

CHAS. H. FARRELL, Mayor.
Kalamazoo, Mich.

Lowell Is Now Discussing the Establishment of an Open Market

RELATIVE to the public market proposition, I would state that the matter has been brought before the Municipal Council recently by the Board of Trade and is now under consideration. The only objection to the proposition comes from the storekeepers, who pay rent and employ help.

Oakland, Calif., Has Had a "Free Market" for Years Past

RELATIVE to the establishment of an open market, we have had something along this line in this city for a number of years. We have here what is called a "free market." It is open every Wednesday and Saturday, and is a place where farmers can bring their supplies to be sold direct to the people. FRANK K. MOTT, Oakland, Calif. Mayor.

Tacoma's Mayor Tells of the Farmers' Market in That City

WE ARE one of the few cities in the West that have a public market "right plumb" in the city street. It is considered here largely a makeshift. It was first intended that this should be a place where the producer would come in and sell his own goods, but this part has not been realized. They find it too expensive to wait, and prefer selling to the man who stays there all day; consequently the market is largely in the hands of the Japanese, with a sprinkling of Greeks and Italians. I think the mistake made in the beginning was that the city did not realize the popularity of a public market, and went about it too "gingerly." What they should have done was to have bought land of their own and owned the market inside. As it stands, this is now privately owned, while the market on the street, run by the city, is a great drawing card to the privately owned market just across the sidewalk, and, the market having been established there (a very nice building has been built by private parties), it is now difficult to change.

The market is very popular, patronized by large numbers, consequently the fruit and vegetables are fresher than can ordinarily be obtained, and at a considerable reduction in price. This, however, has not been effected without occasionally a strong hand exercised by the city, there having been several attempts on the part of the market men to form a "pool," but they have been given to understand that in that case the whole thing will be wiped out.

As might be inferred, it is maintained very much against the protest of the grocers, and in some respects surely with reason. . . . However, as a matter of fact, as I said, in spite of its objections, the market is very popular, the prices very generally lower, and the fruit and vegetables are kept clean. We are just changing our ordinance to require berries and small fruit, etc., in the public market to be put under glass.

Every one admits that it would be far better if the farmers would come in and sell from their wagons, but apparently everybody but the grocers prefers our present arrangement.

W. W. SEYMOUR, Mayor.
Tacoma, Wash.

Louisville Seeking to Improve the Situation, Writes Mayor Head

WE HAVE in our city a large public square where gardeners and produce men of all kinds come in from the country and sell their products in their wagons, and many of our people buy in that manner; but when winter time comes, there is no garden truck from the farms to be marketed and they must depend on canned goods and Southern vegetables. It is hard to get away from the fact that it takes men of means to handle these goods and distribute them to the people.

I believe that every city ought to have a public square where produce of all kinds could be sold to people without charge, as in that way it comes first hand to the consumer and does away with the middleman's profit, and if there is any way that foreign products can be given to the people direct we should have that, but I have not been able to figure out just how that can be done. We are very anxious to improve the situation in our city as much as possible. I believe the mass of the people should get their food as direct as possible, so as to avoid extra prices, and that no combination should be allowed on foodstuffs.

W. O. HEAD, Mayor.
Louisville, Ky.

A GOLDEN WEDDING PRAYER

WITH loving hearts and wishes kind,
A blessing, Lord, we pray
On our dear friends whom thou dost grant
This golden wedding day.

In smiling youth thou didst unite
Their hearts in faithful love,
Recording the fond vow they made
In thy bright heaven above.

Thou wast their constant Friend and Guide
In all the changing years;
Thy changeless love dwelt near their hearts
To bless their joys and tears.

Dear Lord, protect and comfort still
And bless, as in the past;
Make all their days like Cana's feast,
Where the best wine was the last.

THANKSGIVING PSALM

A Rhythmical and Grateful Chant.

A teacher in a Terre Haute public school joins in the chorus:

"Teaching is a business which requires a great deal of brain and nerve force. Unless this force is renewed as fast as expended the teacher is exhausted before the close of the year. Many resort to stimulating tonics for relief.

"For 3 years I struggled against almost complete exhaustion, getting what relief I could from doctors' tonics. Then in the spring of 1903 I had an attack of la grippe and malaria which left me too weak to continue my work. Medicine failed to give me any relief, a change of climate failed. I thought I should never be able to go back in school again.

"I ate enough food, (the ordinary meals—white bread, vegetables, etc.) but was hungry after meals.

"I happened at this time to read an article giving the experience of another teacher who had been helped by Grape-Nuts food. I decided to try Grape-Nuts and cream, as an experiment. It was a delightful experience, and continues so after a year and a half of constant use.

"First, I noticed that I was not hungry after meals.

"In a few days that tired feeling left me, and I felt fresh and bright, instead of dull and sleepy.

"In three months, more than my usual strength returned, and I had gained 15 pounds in weight.

"I finished the year's work without any kind of tonics—was not absent from duty even half a day.

"Am still in the best of health, with all who know me wondering at the improvement.

"I tell them all, 'Try Grape-Nuts!'" Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. "There's a reason."

New Ambassador to France

IN THE new ambassador, who has within the last month arrived to take up his duties in Paris, the United States has sent to one of the choicest diplomatic posts a man who has turned down five other posts in the diplomatic service and three cabinet places. Colonel Myron T. Herrick, the new ambassador, is fifty-eight years of age and is a big, hardy, country-bred man, with the keen eyes and firm mouth of a man who knows business and knows it well. He talks decisively and his voice is of deep musical quality. Ambassador Herrick was born on a farm in Ohio, and his boyhood saw all of the phases that come to the ordinary small boy on the farm. He was bound to have a university training, so by his own efforts he earned enough money to enter Oberlin College. The money for this venture was made by selling dinner bells and organs in the rural districts of Ohio. At the end of his college course he took an agency for a number of farm appliances, and it was during the years of this experience that he gained the close touch with the farmer which later developed his life's hobby, that of farm finance.

Myron T. Herrick

The young agent for farming appliances was gradually making himself felt in the community and through one position after another his ability carried him to the governorship of his State. It was after his retirement from this position that Ambassador Herrick became so greatly interested in farm finance. Time after time he was offered attractive positions in the diplomatic service as well as cabinet posts, but it seemed impossible to tempt him from the riding of his hobby. Finally, however, he was caught by President Taft with the offer of the French post. He believes that the methods of farming of France and Germany, as well as the splendid systems of farm finance which those countries have, can teach us very many things that it would be well for us to know, and only the opportunity to study these conditions and systems at close range has carried this keen and capable ex-governor to fill one of the most important diplomatic positions in the gift of his government.

insist that the substance shall be properly labeled and that it shall accomplish the work it is said to do; at the same time, that no injustice be done, provision is made for public hearings at which the manufacturer's side can be given a fair opportunity to present its arguments. Of course, the merits of the standard insecticides are well known, and it is only required of reputable dealers that certain proportions of the ingredients be observed. For example, lead arsenate, which is coming to be the most frequently used poison for leaf-eating insects, is considered under this law to be adulterated if it contains more than fifty per cent. of water, or if it contains less arsenic than the equivalent of 12½ per cent. of arsenic oxide, or if it contains more arsenic in water-soluble forms than the equivalent of 0.75 per cent. of arsenic oxide, or if any substances have been mixed with it in such a manner as to affect its strength. Although the law was passed April 26, 1910, it did not become effective until July 1, 1911, in order that manufacturers and dealers might have fair notice of the provisions of the bill and regulate their affairs accordingly. To administer the law the Secretary of Agriculture has appointed an Insecticide and Fungicide Board consisting of Dr. M. Dorset of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Professor M. B. Waite of the Bureau of Plant Industry, Professor A. L. Quaintance of the Bureau of Entomology, and Dr. J. K. Haywood of the Bureau of Chemistry; and this body of men is now actively at work. The chemical testing of the substances is being done in already existing laboratories, but for the tests upon insects new field laboratories have been constructed and the efficacy of different proprietary mixtures is being tried out in the most thorough way.

Sunday School Pioneering

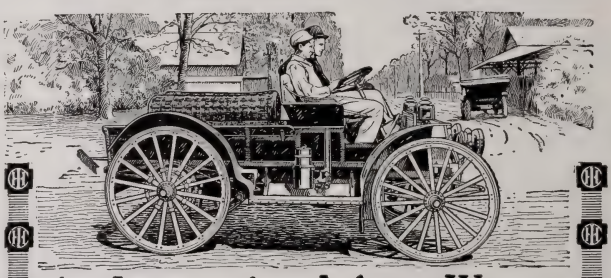
A MISSIONARY of the American Sunday School Union, working in the needy parts of Washington and Idaho, writes as follows:

"One day I stopped off the train at a little way-station, also in Idaho. I found there was no Sunday School at that place, so I called at the schoolhouse and asked the teacher what she thought about starting a Sunday School. 'Well,' said she, 'I would be glad to have you try to start something that would help to lift these boys and girls up instead of dragging them down. We have saloons, and the drunkards go reeling up and down the road every little while, but absolutely nothing is being done to help our children morally. I am not a Christian woman,' she said, 'yet I sometimes ask them something about the Bible, and I am shocked at their ignorance.' Before I left that place I opened up a Sunday School in that schoolhouse, and also another four miles farther up the road. At this last place I found one of the saloonkeeper's little girls was given a bottle of beer nearly every day, and frequently she was seen playing with the other children in an intoxicated condition holding her bottle of beer.

"One day in another section, I had walked for miles in the rain through the forest. I finally became confused and lost my bearings, when just at nightfall I came to a clearing in which stood a log cabin. Going up to the door I knocked and was told to come in. Lying on a rude bed in one corner of the room was a woman, perhaps fifty years of age. When I told her who I was she said, 'I am awful glad to see you; won't you remain with us over night?' 'Why,' said I, 'of course I would like to, but I won't bother you at this time, for you are sick and unable to care for your own family.' 'Now, don't let that worry you,' said she; 'a Christian worker is the last person we expect to see in these parts, and we want to have you with us to-night anyway; we will make out somehow.' And so it was arranged that I was to have a bed in the attic. The father soon came home and then we all had supper. Afterward we talked, sang, and then a psalm and prayer. The father, then starting up the rude ladder that led to the loft above, said, 'Now if you will follow me I will show you where you are to roost to-night.' It was only on a tick of dried grass lying on the floor—the little girl's bed; and yet with the rain pouring all night on the home-made shingles, I slept as sweetly as I ever did in an old-fashioned Eastern feather bed! Next morning the rain had nearly ceased, so, giving the little girl and her brother each a Testament, I pushed on to a point five miles west, where a little school building was being erected. Here I organized a good Sunday School. This work has been kept up and preaching services are now held every Sunday, and in a short time it is expected that a church will be organized. I carefully look after all my schools, which are always provided with Bibles, song books, lesson helps, good libraries, etc., through the aid of kind friends who give money to buy what is needed. The people here are poor."

An Ancient Aviator

A FRENCH Oriental student, says the Westminster Gazette, has discovered a surprisingly early record of experiments in aviation. The hero of the enterprise was one Ibn-Firnas, an Arab of Spain and physician to the Khalif Abdurrahman II., who flourished in the ninth century. Renowned as an inventor as well as a doctor, he devised a clockwork apparatus by means of which he "flattered himself that he would be able to rise into the air like a bird," and a crowd assembled near Cordova to see him try. He did, it seems, actually get off the ground, but fell again with a great thud amid the derisive cheers of the populace. The story has just been found and pointed out in an Arabic work by a certain El Makkari.



An International Auto Wagon Will Earn Its Keep on Your Farm

IT is in the seasons when your horses are all needed in the field or when the weather is most unfavorable for driving, that the International auto wagon shows its real worth. It is always ready to take the milk or cream to the creamery, deliver produce and fruit, bring your purchases from town, or take the children to school.

With it you can oversee the farm, do all light hauling, visit any friend within thirty miles, take the family driving or to church.

International Auto Wagons

are sturdy, every-day workers. The frame, axles and wheels are strong enough to carry any load the wagon should hold, over any road. The 20-H. P engine has power enough to meet any road emergency. The transmission gives two forward speeds and reverse, with no danger of stripping gears. The brakes are powerful.

The International auto wagon is just the car for farmers. See the I H C local dealer and get facts, figures, and catalogues from him, or, write

Ponies Farthest South

ALMOST all CHRISTIAN HERALD boys and girls have been talking "pony" so much of late that you will be interested to hear something about the four sturdy little Manchurians that helped Lieutenant Shackleton and his men on their final dash toward the South Pole. No story of determined fidelity and exultant endurance is more touching, more thrilling or more pitiful. Stocks, Quam, Grizi and Chinaman were the ponies' names, and from the very first they seemed to catch the spirit of the perilous journey and did their full share as interested and dependable members of the exploring party.

No dreary, dull pack horses were they. No indeed! for while each little pony person was ever ready and eager to work, each one was something considerably more than a mere workman. Quam, for example, was playful, and took to his duties in the merriest manner. At the end of the day, immediately on being set free, away he would go prancing and dancing and capering about, kicking up his heels in a perfectly good and lovable humor, until you would declare that, all in his wise little head, he deemed it his duty, as the light-hearted member, to keep the entire party in cheerful spirits. Sometimes it was ten or fifteen minutes before Quam could be caught and quieted after he had started on his merry pranks. Chinaman was of a serious and dependable disposition, always anticipating his duties and surprising everybody with his wise ways. He covered himself with glory one morning by discovering under which snowdrift the pony rations were hidden, after a four days' blizzard, when no progress could be made, and all hands had turned out to find the lost fodder. Chinaman died from the effects of a shock he received from falling through an ice crevasse in a floe onto which the party was making its mistaken way. The pony struggled bravely and saved himself, but the shock to his body, perspiring with the effort of pulling a six-hundred-pound sledge over the soft snow, was too great, and though every loving effort was made they could not save him.

The brave explorers not only cared for the ponies with utmost tenderness and encouragement, but often they made heroic sacrifices on their account. At one time the supply of oil was so low that the men ate cold biscuit and chocolate rather than use the last gallon to cook with, preferring to heat with it something called hot hoosch, which was good and strengthening for the ponies. In turn there were times when the ponies would not eat their allotted supplies, but for some unaccountable reason preferred to chew up their own halters and ropes and blankets. Not until hardships grew too rigorous to be endured did the companionable little pony people give up, literally dying one after the other in the harness; hauling ever faithfully the sledges, and often, by refusing to go any further in a certain direction, warning the party of danger from ice ridges, crevasses, thin snow crusts and dangerous cracks ahead.

Grizi and Stocks outlasted the others, and when Grizi died Stocks whinnied and called all night long for his lost companions. They were all gone, and the plucky little fellow was lonely, lonelier perhaps than any one realized; but he labored on willingly, almost exultantly, to the end of his day's work, and within a few degrees of "farthest south" he too gave out, and was the last of the race of twenty ponies in all, that from the beginning helped Lieutenant Shackleton on one of the greatest journeys of adventure the world has ever known.

An Enterprising Boy

JOHN KITCHERLY, who lives in a small town in the White Hills of New Hampshire, is making his own way to a college education, and he wants other CHRISTIAN HERALD boys to know how he is doing it.

John is twelve years old. He goes to the village school, where I am afraid from what he writes he is not a star pupil. But he wants to go to college, and his uncle in Boston will give him half of his expenses provided he will earn the other half. John has several plans for making money already on foot, and now that the winter has broken and people can more readily get about in the village, he has freshly painted his last season's sign and fastened it on the end of the back porch. The sign reads: I can mend broken dishes. For plain breaks he charges five cents; for compound fractures, John explains, he charges more. He lives near the post office, and people going by are glad to leave ordinary broken plates and dishes at the little homemade repair shop. Last year he mended over 250 ordinary breaks and half as many serious ones. John only works at mending dishes for an hour or so after school, so it does not interfere much with fun or his other duties, and he has worked up a nice village trade.

Why the Brush never touches the Can

"Please hurry with that Dr. Lyon's"

DR. LYON was by no means content with producing the purest, finest and most efficient dentifrice. He deemed it of equal importance to provide the utmost hygiene and elegance in its manner of use. To this refinement of method as well as quality, the long established place of distinction, apart from merely commercial tooth preparations, is due. For it is equally the fame of

Dr. Lyon's
PERFECT
Tooth Powder

(Prepared for nearly half a century by a doctor of dental surgery)

that it is unrivaled for the life-time preservation of the teeth, and that any number of persons can use it from the same can, each serene against all thought of common contact.*

The patent measuring tube which forms the neck of the can, delivers just the right quantity of powder to the brush by a tap of the finger. The brush and the can never touch.

Yet another vital advantage of Dr. Lyon's being in powder form: It brings no saccharine, glycerine, gelatine, glucose or honey to form sticky masses between the teeth to cause decay. It encourages thorough brushing, keeping the gums healthy and hard. Tartar and discoloration disappear. A natural fragrance of breath is maintained. Use Dr. Lyon's Perfect Tooth Powder night and morning—ABOVE ALL, AT NIGHT. Train your children early to its constant use.

What Dr. Lyon's does not do should be entrusted only to your dentist to do.

Sold Everywhere

So long has this feature enjoyed high appreciation that Robert Louis Stevenson, in his famous romance, "The Ebb Tide," mentions Dr. Lyon's and the fact that any number of persons can use it with perfect propriety and neatness.*

OUR COMFORT CORNER

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Essentials in Home Life

IN HOME LIFE contentment is an essential to daily comfort. One discontented person in the house creates an atmosphere fatal to tranquillity. Cut the coat according to the cloth, live within the income, and have a margin. If there is no certain income, and a constant struggle with small means insufficient for the needs of the family must be waged, it may be in that case hard to be contented. Here the remedy is resignation. Let the tried and tempted one lean with all possible weight on the promises of God. We have the word of the Scriptures for it that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." When discouraged and overburdened repeat this little verse:

When obstacles and trials seem Like prison walls to be,
I do the little I can do,
And leave the rest to Thee.

Or else be comforted with the sweet thought in another hymn:

I know not the way I am going,
But well do I know my Guide.
With a childlike faith I take the hand
Of the mighty Friend at my side.

Strive for contentment and never permit circumstances to crush you, deprive you of health and of good cheer. It is always better farther on. It's the long lane that has no turning. "God's in his heaven, all's right with the world." This means not only with the big world outside the door, but with the little world within the home and the world of the individual soul.

ANOTHER essential for success in home life is common sense. There are people endowed with every quality that is desirable except this. In consequence, they give wrong impressions of themselves and others. They blunder and make mistakes and get into false positions. The effect upon their daily life is disastrous. When the housekeeper omits salt from the food she is cooking, the addition of that condiment when the food is on the table is not entirely satisfactory. Salt should be added in the process of cooking. Common sense is like salt; it adds the right flavor. Also it shows people the true perspective.

Allied to common sense very closely is tact. This is sometimes confused with insincerity. The two qualities are not related to one another. Tact simply means touch, and the tactful person feels with others in quick sympathy, and is not apt to hurt a friend by saying or doing the wrong thing. We should be tactful in our management of children. The tactful mother never needlessly provokes an issue, and if she has the loving ingenuity with which she should be gifted, her little ones will obey her without conflict and fuss. Some mothers make one think of a builder who would leave the scaffolding in plain sight after completing the house. Their discipline is forever in evidence, and they are so fearful that their children will fail to do them credit that they are on the watch for misdemeanors, when, instead, they ought to be on the watch for good conduct deserving praise.

A THIRD and very important essential in successful home life is an even temper. If it be possible to teach a fiery thoroughbred to understand the meaning of the rein, it should be possible, too, for each of us to hold temperament in check, and subdue the tendency to anger and injustice. Ill-tempered and aggressive wives and husbands, fathers and mothers, transform home into a penitential abode where nothing flourishes except ill weeds, and flowers do not thrive.

To drop metaphor and speak in literal terms, an essential of home happiness is amiability, and this should be diffused through the entire family. As for children, their tendency to quarrel and dispute, if it exist, should be firmly repressed.

There is an old church in New Jersey which, during the Revolutionary War, was the scene of a well-contested fight between the Americans and the British. The former were entrenched in the building and fired from the windows. The latter were well provided with weapons and made a stubborn offensive attack. At a certain crisis in the battle the guns of the besieged needed packing, and the parson, stanch soldier that he was in the church militant, led his people in tearing the leaves from the hymn-books, saying boldly, "Give 'em Watts, boys! Give 'em Watts!" In quite another sense, when Satan's skirmishers venture into the precincts of the nursery, the wise mother may give her children Watts, or perhaps not Isaac Watts, but Jane Taylor, who must have lived about the same period.

When the grandmothers were little children, they were not only taught their prayers, but were told to Let dogs delight to bark and bite,

For 'tis their nature to;
Let bears and lions growl and fight,
For God hath made them so.
But, children, you should never let
Your angry passions rise;
Your little hands were never made
To tear each other's eyes.

AN ANXIOUS mother writes to inquire what books she shall choose for her little children, who are respectively two and four years old. The boy of two may wait awhile before being inducted strenuously into literature. Still, it is not too soon for the mother to amuse him, as well as his older sister, with bits of rhyme that may stick in the mind. Dear Old Mother Goose is perennial, and no nursery is rightly furnished without her book. Songs for the Little Ones at Home, an old favorite recently reprinted in beautiful style, ought to be close to the mother's hand. Little Susy's Six Birthdays and Little Susy's Six Teachers, if they can be found, are admirable books for little children. Fairy stories are as necessary to the mental development of children as bread and butter to their physical well-being. Do not forget that from the earliest age the mother may tell little stories to the children, although they may not be old enough to pay attention to consecutive reading.

Women in Council

AMONG the letters that have recently been sent to this corner is one from the wife of a farmer in Oregon. She takes strong exception to the expressed desire of several women that the men and boys of the family should come to the table with at least a little preparation as to washing hands and faces and putting on a coat, and thinks that a warm-hearted, good-natured man who works hard and provides generously should be excused if he eat with his knife, reach across the table to help himself, dip his bread in the gravy, and do various other things unusual in polite society. "What," she indignantly inquires, "has a farmer or a farmer's wife to do with conventional rules, etiquette and frills?"

The answer to her question will depend very much on the point of view. It is, of course, absurd to expect a busy farmer or his hired man, in the season between April and November, to come to the table as the city man may, after a bath and change of clothes. The latter man has finished his day's work, as a rule, when he leaves the office or the store. The man on the farm has stock to feed and water, cows to milk, horses to stall and a number of indispensable evening chores when his work in the fields is over. He is too tired to feel like making a radical change of costume. Yet he will be very much refreshed by a resort to soap and water for hands and face. Neither need he sit down in shirt sleeves when a simple coat of cotton cloth or linen hanging up on a peg can be put on in a jiffy. By the time that a man has grown up and arrived at maturity without learning the good manners that should be automatic with every one, it is useless to try to reform him. The wife probably knew all about the man's manners before he became her husband. If her own manners are good, as they probably are, women being more imitative than men, she can teach her boys a few rules that are necessary to the gentleman. Whether he be a lad on the farm or the President in the White House, he may lift his hat when he meets a lady, decline to sit still at ease in his chair when his mother is standing, and pass the food to others at the table before helping himself. Politeness is founded on convenience and kindness of heart. It should belong to one's character. There are worse sins than infractions of civility, it is true, yet the real happiness of life depends more than most of us think on the observance of little things.

Quitting Work

THIS looks like a dangerous way to quit work, but the man who must travel the streets of a city in going to and from his work is in more actual danger than this man because most accidents are caused by the carelessness of others. This man's safety depends upon himself, the chain and the engineer, but the safety of the man on the street depends upon a thousand and one circumstances over which he has no control. For every man the only sensible thing is an accident insurance policy protecting himself in case of injury and protecting his family in case of death. There are no other accident policies equal to those issued by the TRAVELERS.

Little things on little wings
Bear little souls to heaven.

Concerning Stewardship

A CORRESPONDENT writes very earnestly and a little uncharitably in criticism of those of us who spend a certain amount of our income on dress and furniture. She declares that the silver and gold and the cattle on a thousand hills belong to the Lord. Her theory is that nothing is pleasing to the Lord or consistent with a Christian life that is not in the last degree ascetic. So have thought many good people in almost every age of the world. There are devotees in India, worshipers of false gods, who do nothing for the good of the world, who live on the alms of others and spend years in prayer and self-denials. There are barefoot monks in Europe who still live by begging. Stewardship implies serving the Lord with gladness, making the one pound ten pounds, and giving the right proportion of the income to the work of Christ, which is largely work among the poor. Jesus rebuked the ascetic spirit when Judas found fault because Mary broke her alabaster box of precious nard and poured it on his feet. Judas said, "This ointment could have been sold for three hundred pence and given to the poor." Jesus replied, "The poor ye have always with you, and me ye have not always." To interpret the Bible right we must read it from cover to cover, and not depend on isolated texts.

Outdoor Occupations

THE newspapers chronicled the other day the death at seventy of a Swiss woman, Madame Esther Meyer, who for many years drove a diligence over the mountain roads of her country. She managed four horses with perfect ease and rare skill, guiding them across dangerous mountain passes without a tremor. Her father was an innkeeper, and she began her occupation of driving the diligence when she was a mere girl.

In Philadelphia women have lately become conspicuous as conductors on electric cars. There seems no reason why they should not be very successful in this work. The hours of standing on an open platform will be far less taxing on feminine endurance than the same number of hours spent behind a counter in a department store breathing vitiated air. The open-air work will probably attract women enough to make the companies feel that they have moved in the right direction.

Poems Every One Should Know

The Three Fishers

THREE fishers went sailing out into the west,
Out into the west as the sun went down;
Each thought on the woman who loved him the best,
And the children stood watching them out of the town;
For men must work, and women must weep,
And there's little to earn, and many to keep,
Though the harbor bar be moaning.

Three wives sat up in the lighthouse tower,
And they trimmed the lamps as the sun went down;
They looked at the squall, and they looked at the shower,
And the night rack came rolling up ragged and brown!
But men must work, and women must weep,
Though storms be sudden, and waters deep,
And the harbor bar be moaning.

Three corpses lay out on the shining sands
In the morning gleam as the tide went down;
And the women are weeping and wringing their hands
For those who will never come back to the town;
For men must work, and women must weep,
And the sooner it's over, the sooner to sleep—
And good-by to the bar and its moaning.

CHARLES KINGSLEY (1819-1875).

The circumstances under which this song was written are related in Charles Kingsley's memoirs by his wife, as follows: In June, 1851, he preached a powerful sermon to workingmen in a London church; no sooner had he finished it than the incumbent who had asked him to preach arose in the reading desk and denounced his sermon. It was a painful scene, which narrowly escaped ending in a riot; and he felt keenly, not the insult to himself, but the disgrace to the church and the estrangement it would be likely to increase between the workingmen and the clergy. He came home the day after, wearied and worn out, but took his usual afternoon walk. When he returned in the evening he brought with him The Three Fishers as though it were the outcome of it all; and then seemed to put the matter aside, and the current of his daily life followed on as before.

Charles Kingsley, rector of Eversley, was one of the most virile and interesting Englishmen of the Victorian age. He wrote many songs, such as Oh That We Two Were Maying, The Sands of Dee, etc., that are still well known but not usually known to be his. His literary reputation is built upon his prose works, the best known of which are Westward Ho, Yeast, Hypatia, Alton Locke and Water-Babies.

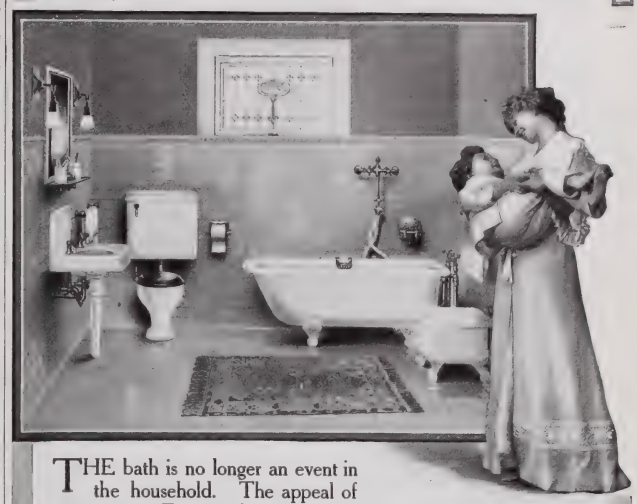
"Standard" GUARANTEED PLUMBING FIXTURES



THE bath is no longer an event in the household. The appeal of "Standard" Fixtures has supplanted "sense of duty" by a "desire for cleanliness." Children love bathing amidst the surroundings which "Standard" Fixtures form. Their refining influence is as valuable to the home as their practical utility, their beauty and their defiance of age and use.

Genuine "Standard" fixtures for the Home and for School, Office Buildings, Public Institutions, etc., are identified by the Green and Gold Label, with the exception of one brand of baths bearing the Red and Black Label, which, while of the first quality of manufacture, have a slightly thinner enameling, and thus meet the requirements of those who demand "Standard" quality at less expense. All "Standard" fixtures, with care, will last a lifetime. And no fixture is genuine unless it bears the guarantee label. In order to avoid the substitution of inferior fixtures, specify "Standard" goods in writing (not verbally) and make sure that you get them.

WRITE STORIES THAT WILL SELL

It is simply lack of good stories that forces publishers to print so many poor ones. If you had the necessary training you could probably write better ones than some you read. The Emery Course in Short Story Writing, Novel Writing and Journalism have helped very many authors toward fame and fortune. A number of our students are earning big money with their pens. One accepted story may cover the entire cost of training. The terms are easy. Write today for our Booklet 21. We criticise and publish manuscripts.

INVESTMENT NOTES

SINCE the earliest days of the world's history, commerce and industrial enterprises have been built upon the savings of the thrifty. The success of every progressive nation has been in proportion to the ease with which money could be borrowed for investment in business enterprises, and to-day there is nothing that has contributed more to the industrial wealth of the nation than the willingness of great and small investors to entrust their funds to individuals and enterprises which seem to promise ultimate repayment and a fair return on their investments. It is this borrowed capital which keeps the wheels of the railroads turning, factories working, steamships plying between the different countries of the world, and enables the farmer to buy his land and harvest his crops.

No one to-day questions the benefits of this borrowing and lending, properly restricted; benefits which accrue not only to the borrower and lender, but to the world at large.

Notes given to evidence a loan are the simplest form of investments. If Mr. Farmer in April needs five hundred dollars to enable him to put in his crop, he goes to Mr. Banker and gives him his note, whereby he promises to pay Mr. Banker five hundred dollars in six months with interest, and when no rate of interest or indeed no interest at all is specified the law reads into the note the legal rate, which is generally six per cent. Mr. Banker then gives Mr. Farmer four hundred and eighty-five dollars, deducting the interest, or fifteen dollars, in advance. This process is called discounting a note. Oftentimes, however, the interest is not paid till the "maturity" of the note, in which case Mr. Farmer at the end of six months repays to Mr. Banker five hundred and fifteen dollars, and "takes up" his note. Mr. Farmer is the "maker" of the note and Mr. Banker the "payee."

In many of the States the law permits the making of so-called "judgment notes." Pennsylvania is an instance of this. It is customary in judgment notes, in addition to the promise to pay, to authorize the immediate filing of the note in the county prothonotary's office, and the entry of judgment thereon, with an additional amount to cover attorney's fees if the note is not paid at maturity. The note having been thus filed, at its maturity, if it be not paid, the payee, or a subsequent holder to whom it has been transferred by the payee by "indorsing" it, can, through an attorney at law, cause the issuance of an execution to the sheriff. The sheriff, by virtue of this execution, sells enough of the personal property of the payee to satisfy the note, interest, attorney's fee and sheriff's fee. Or, if there be not enough personalty to satisfy these claims, the payee's land within the county in which the execution is issued can be sold for the same purpose.

The filing of the note in the prothonotary's office makes it a lien on the land owned by the payee in the county in which it is filed, at the time of filing. No matter to whom the land may be deeded after the filing of the note, it is always security for the note and can be sold to satisfy it. In other States, such as New York, the note cannot be thus filed, but on its maturity an action at law must be brought and a judgment obtained before the payee's land becomes liable or any execution can issue against his property. Now, if Mr. Banker is not satisfied that Mr. Farmer's land is sufficiently valuable to secure the note, he may ask him to get some one to sign the note as maker with Mr. Farmer, or as endorser by the third person signing his name to the back of the note. The third party thus becomes an "accommodation" maker or "accommodation" endorser. In that case both the endorser and the maker can be held for the payment thereof at maturity.

Of course, in case of two judgment notes by the same maker, the land of the maker is liable first to the note first filed no matter if that note bears a more recent date than the other. In other words, the note first filed is a first lien in such States at Pennsylvania. If Mr. Banker, the payee, desires to sell the note to another party, he endorses his name on the back of the note under that of the accommodation endorser, and hands the note to the new "holder." He in turn can endorse it to another party. Each endorser in turn is liable to the party who holds the note at its maturity for the full payment thereof.

If any endorser pays the note he can hold all prior endorsers and the maker liable to himself for the amount he has paid. In order that the endorsers may be held liable by any subsequent holder at maturity, however, the note must be "protested." This is done generally by a notary public, who sends a notice by mail to each endorser, stating that the note has not been paid at maturity, and that the endorsers will be held. This is not necessary as against the maker. If the payee or any holder of a note wishes to transfer it without becoming personally liable, he can do so by adding to his endorsed signature the words "without recourse."

The foregoing remarks apply, of course, equally to corporations, which are defined as artificial persons created by the State, and which, in a general way, can, through their officers and directors, execute papers and conduct business like natural persons. It must be observed, however, that corporations, as a rule, cannot become accommodation makers or endorsers of promissory notes.

The laws of most of the States are uniform on the subject of promissory notes, as the desirability of the free circulation of this and other forms of commercial paper without regard to State boundaries is everywhere recognized.

DAVID PAINE.

Among the Workers

—MISS MATTIE PERRY, founder and superintendent of the Elhanan Training Institute at Elhanan, N. C., has conducted a remarkable work in that place for upwards of ten years past. The founding of this industrial school for homeless mountain children was purely a work of faith. Many crises have come since it began, but they have been surmounted by the wonderful faith of Miss Perry and her associates. It is a work well deserving of support and encouragement.

—THE SECRETARY OF THE Y. M. C. A. in the Philippines writes: "It is impossible for us to get magazines and books enough to supply the most needy places. Send a big supply and please keep them coming. We should have at least a shipment every two months." Similar appeals have been received from Guantanamo, Cuba, Manila and Alaska. Any books and magazines which our readers wish to send to these places should be mailed, freight prepaid, to the Secretary of the Army and Navy Y. M. C. A. at 124 East Twenty-eighth Street, New York City.

—WRITING OF his evangelistic campaign at Los Angeles, Gipsy Smith says: "There was not a weak meeting. The results, so far as we could see them, to make a record, were wonderful. Somewhere between five and six thousand cards were signed by those who made a public confession of Christ for the first time, or those who had been brought back to a renewal of their Christian life. These are scattered all over the city and State, but will be followed up faithfully by the pastors and churches. One day the names of 1,400 people were taken of those deciding to live for Christ. This was one of the great days of my life."

—A REMARKABLE RELIGIOUS campaign is reported from Honolulu. Bishop Restarick, Anglican Bishop of Hawaii, accompanied by two leading clergymen of his church, paid a formal official visit to the annual conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church then in session and spoke earnestly for a union of all Christian denominations and the brotherhood that should bind Roman Catholics, Episcopalians and Evangelicals. When Bishop Bashford, Methodist Episcopal Bishop of China, replied his voice was scarcely audible, so great was his emotion. This is probably the first occasion on which a bishop of the Anglican Church has officially greeted a body of evangelical clericals.

Over the Telephone

BY E. B. MERRITT

IT IS a dull, gray morning. The clock has just struck seven. Mr. Smart is in the rear of his combined butcher shop and grocery store preparing for the day's business. Johnny, his one assistant in the shop, has just come, manifesting symptoms of an unfinished sleep.

Mr. Smart wraps his white apron around him and smiles gleefully. "It's a great world, Johnny; don't you feel happy?" he asks cheerfully.

"As happy as a caught fish," answers the boy petulantly.

"Oh, brace up. The world was made to be happy in. Start the day by feeling good toward every one. I feel like I could love my worst enemy, and—"

The telephone rings.

"Is that Smart's grocery store?" asks a voice on the wire.

"Yes, ma'am. What can I do for you?"

"Do for me! You just wait till you get a chance to do anything for me again. You charged me twelve cents more for eggs yesterday than you did a week ago. Do you think I'll stand for any such imposition as that?"

"But, madam, let me explain; the market price—"

"Explain nothing. I don't want to talk to you any more!" Bang!

"My! Did you ever hear of such a woman!"

"Thought you said you could love your worst enemy," comments Johnny.

The telephone rings again. "Is that Mr. Smart?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"I want a half-dozen eggs right away; I haven't a thing in the place for breakfast; Mrs. Jones; yes. But, listen here—those last eggs you sent me weren't fresh."

"They were fresh eggs, Mrs. Jones, just like I always have."

"Please don't argue, Mr. Smart. I never like to have any one contradict me. How long before I can get the eggs? It must be right away."

"Why, you're eight blocks away, Mrs. Jones."

"I don't care if I am. I do all my trading with you. My account last month was $22, and if you can't accommodate me once, I'll get another grocer."

"Oh, there's no need of doing that. I'll send your eggs." (Hangs up the receiver.) "Accommodate her once—humph! I wonder if a grocer could keep her trade a week without accommodating her a half-dozen times a day!"

Another ring of the telephone. "Mr. Smart, this is Mrs. Bradley. I must have a box of oatmeal for breakfast. Please send it right away."

"Sorry, but the wagon's getting ready to go about a mile the other way, Mrs. Bradley, and it may be a half-hour before I can get it to you."

"That is preposterous. Why can't you send your clerk with it?"

"Impossible. He's got to fix up the early orders."

"I never heard of such a grocery store in my life!" (A grating sound as the receiver is slammed on its hook.)

"Oh, Mr. Smart," says the next voice, "this is Mrs. Lewis. Can you get me a pound of butterine over right away? I've got the toast already on—so it must come right away."

"How can I get a pound of butterine over there by the time your toast is brown?"

"Well, if you can't do it, you need not send your solicitor around any more. I'm tired of being refused accommodation."

"And to think; there's a woman I've treated with all kinds of consideration," Mr. Smart soliloquizes, despairingly. "A fine chance a grocer has of getting his customers' affections."

"You love all those people, don't you?" teases Johnny, from the front of the store.

Another ring. "Is that you, Mr. Smart? This is Mrs. Jones again. I want some bacon sent with my eggs."

"Your eggs are on the way."

"On the way? Why, I must have the bacon. Can't you send the boy in the store with it?"

"No, ma'am, I can't spare him."

"Well, you ought to have more clerks."

"It's all I can do to pay the one," murmurs Mr. Smart.

"I'd advise you to improve your service. Good-by." (With sternness.)

"Mr. Smart, you'd better come and talk to this lady; she says you cheated her," calls Johnny.

"What next?" the grocer asks himself, struggling with his philosophy.

"Look here, Mr. Smart, I don't let anybody take advantage of me, and that's just what you have done," exclaims the angry woman in the store.

"What's the trouble?" meekly inquires Mr. Smart.

"I have been buying tomatoes for ten cents a can for years and yesterday you had twelve cents on my ticket."

"Have to do it, Mrs. Clancy. The tomato crop was short this year and the price is up. I pay $1.35 a dozen and I make a gross profit of nine cents a dozen. So I'm not piling up any wealth on the canned tomatoes I sell."

"You can't tell me that's all the profit you make. You grocers are getting rich with these high prices," is her parting shot.

"She ought to have to pay the expenses; she'd change her mind," observes Mr. Smart as the telephone rings again.

"Hello!" says the voice. "That sack of flour you sent me was short in weight, and I refuse to pay for it. Yes; Mrs. Smith."

"I'll send you another. Good—"

"But wait a minute. That can of coffee lacked more than an inch of being full."

"All right, Mrs. Smith, I'll send another can of coffee, too."

"I must have them right away."

"Every woman thinks we've got a horse and wagon waiting at the door to deliver her stuff the instant it's telephoned for," observes the grocer, "and if they pay a few cents more than they did when they came and got their goods they cry out about the high cost of living."

"Mr. Smart," chimes in a voice on the telephone, "do you know, two of the dozen eggs you sent me were broken, and I'm sure that steak wasn't a good two pounds and the butter tastes a bit old."

"Come over and we'll fix it up, Mrs. Lester."

"Come over! The very idea! I can't leave the house before noon, and then I'm going downtown. You send me over two eggs, another pound of butter, and I think you ought to give me a couple of chops for the short weight in the steak."

"She never got a full-weight piece of meat in her life, according to her scale," comments Mr. Smart. "And there's a woman who used to come to the store and carry her stuff home, and she was glad she was living."

"I forgot before, Mr. Smart, but I must have five pounds of sugar. This is Mrs. Bradley," says the next voice.

"Your oatmeal is on the way, Mrs. Bradley, and I don't think I can send the sugar very soon."

"Now isn't that too bad! Well, we've got to have it. You don't expect us to drink unsweetened coffee, do you?"

"No, ma'am, I don't; but I can't help it."

"Hello, Mr. Smart," says the next voice on the wire; "I simply can't understand my checks. It seems to me I'm being overcharged. I wish you'd come over here and explain them to me."

"I can't leave the store, Mrs. Bailey."

"Well, I certainly don't expect to pay the bill until I've had the checks, explained to me."

"It doesn't occur to her," observes the grocer, "that she could come here as she goes to other stores."

"Mr. Smart, I'm giving a dinner tonight and I wish you would send your man over right away to take an order," is the next message.

"She hasn't balanced her bill in six months, and giving dinners; yet they talk about the high cost of living," mutters the grocer sadly.

"You can send right over and get that sugar you sent me; it's full of specks," angrily speaks Mrs. Todd.

"I've changed my mind," says the next person at the telephone. "I want lamb chops instead of a steak."

"But the steak's already cut and ready to be sent."

"Such poor accommodation! I'll never trade with you again!"

"Heaven help me!" sighs the grocer, as he climbs down from the desk chair by the telephone. "No one's said a kind word to me this morning. The poor grocer is blamed for everything. Customers used to come to the store, buy their goods, pay for them and carry them home. Now they telephone, want them delivered, have them charged, expect a thousand and one favors and complain if they have to pay a few cents more than they used to. The grocer, they say, is making a lot of money. They who say it don't know. The expenses of operating, with all the service the public demands and the increased price of labor, leaves a very small margin of profit."

"You don't look quite as merry as you did," laughs Johnny.

"I've just received the first instalment of my daily castigation," says Mr. Smart, "but I'll be merry again, after a bit."

Answered Prayers

W. H. C., Denniston, Va. "I have had almost direct answers to prayers for years. My petitions have been answered in His own good way and time."

H. A. S., Waldwick, N. J. "God has answered my prayers and given me a turning-point in my life, and the opportunities for which I prayed."

Mrs. P. H. R., Colorado Springs, Colo. "I want to acknowledge God's goodness to me in answering my prayer. Blessed be his dear name, who heard me."

M. W., Toronto, Can. "My husband was an unbeliever, but I prayed for years. Sometimes I lost courage, but prayed, and now my husband is a Christian. I thank the Lord Almighty."

Miss H. E. P., Painted Post, N. Y. "I wish to acknowledge God's great goodness and mercy in answering prayer, particularly on the occasion of great danger and again in granting strength under great stress."

Make Big Money This Summer With This Machine

"I made $1500 first month in Louisiana with this same machine"—H. W. Eakins.

A wonderful money maker—moderate investment required. Almost four cents profit on every nickel. It makes Popcorn Crispettes—a new, tempting, tasty, delicious confection. Nothing like them ever sold before. People eat and eat and eat them because of the alluring taste. Children buy eagerly. Adults like them just as well. Even the old folks want them. New, secret process, known only to purchasers of my machine makes successful competition impossible. If you follow instructions you should make $500 a month this summer dead easy; more than that if you hustle. Why shouldn't you do as well as Mr. Eakins? Fascinating, easy employment. Anybody can make Crispettes. You can clean up big profits at

California Wants You This Spring

You would want California this Spring—you would take a farm anywhere else—could you see what I saw in the San Joaquin Valley in March

This wonderful sun-kissed Valley is prospering and developing with rapid strides. You can make its increase in values profit you.

Its 8,000,000 acres have a farm-ready and on terms that will allow the land to pay for itself. On your deferred payments the interest will be only six per cent or less.

In this Spring but forty or eighty acres, cared for as it should will give you a good living and a nice sum put out of your place to alkalis—get a few good dairy cows from the man who owns the creamery that will sell them to you on time and from the first there will be an income. After the first year the profits from the place will meet all payments—in fact, or at most for years you will be out of debt and the rich properties of a home that you to sell for $250 or more per acre and will bring you a net income of at least $40 an acre, much more when your trees come into bearing. I give you average results. If you put in more than average cares and thought your results will be proportionate.

I wish you would read our new book about the San Joaquin Valley—then tell me if you are interested and let me answer your questions. The book is free.

How to Be Rich*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

POSSIBLY after having studied the Beatitudes only last week, given in Matthew's Gospel, we shall be somewhat surprised to have them again given to us as they are found in Luke's Gospel. Let us recognize that their setting is different because over against the "blessings" are put the cursings. We are reminded of that scene when Israel on their journey to the promised land came into the Valley of Shechem, where Mount Ebal rose on one side and Mount Gerizim on the other. According to God's command given to Moses, Joshua set up great stones and plastered them with plaster and wrote on the plaster the words of God's laws. And on Ebal he built an altar of stones, and on Gerizim he did likewise; then he divided the people in two parts, and he commanded them to take their places, half on one mountain, and half on the other. The Levites stood in the valley and read God's laws written on the stones, and the people on Mount Ebal answered "Amen" as a curse was pronounced after the reading of each law on those who should disobey God's laws. And the people who stood on Mount Gerizim answered "Amen" when the Levites read about the blessedness which should come to those who should keep God's laws in their hearts and do them. Ever since that occasion Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim have been called the mountains of cursing and blessing. (Read Deut. 27; Deut. 28; Joshua 8: 30-35.)

Let us now recall the fact that the Mount of Beatitudes, Kurun Hattin, had two peaks. Let us take one of the peaks for the blessings and the other for the woes as we find them in Luke's Gospel.

It is claimed that the viewpoint of Luke differs from that of Matthew in that Luke wrote with the twelve apostles in mind, while Matthew wrote for the throng of people, such as had gathered about Christ when he preached the Sermon on the Mount. At least, we have considered the Beatitudes from that viewpoint, and now we will take the other. It is quite reasonable to suppose that the words of Jesus meant more to the apostles than to the throng.

"Blessed are the poor." If Jesus had not where to lay his head, the apostles who were constantly going about with him could not have fared much better. Peter is the only apostle mentioned as having a house. Jesus' warning words, "Woe unto you that are rich," may have been a consolation that they were delivered from the temptations of wealth. Judas fell because he carried the bag!

"Blessed are ye that hunger now." Jesus saw that his apostles hungered and thirsted after knowledge and righteousness, and in this they were a great contrast to the proud Pharisees, who in their own estimation were full of wisdom and godliness.

"Blessed are ye that weep now." More than once the apostles were reproved by Jesus (recall, if you can, the several instances). But Jesus did not cast them off because they lacked faith, or even deserted him, as at Gethsemane. Peter wept bitterly after he had denied Jesus, but afterward Jesus gave him the commission to "Feed my sheep." Those that "laugh" must mean here, not the lighthearted who laugh at legitimate fun, but those who take life as a joke, and do all they can to pass its serious problems and induce others to do the same. Woe unto them! Woe will be unto them!

"Blessed are ye when men shall hate you." Much is told us about how men hated Jesus, particularly the Pharisees, and there can be no doubt that his apostles came in for their full share. We know that Peter did, when the servant maid of the high priest pointed the finger of scorn at him, saying, "This man also was with him." Again and again the Pharisees upbraided the Master to his apostles: "Why eateth your Master with publicans and sinners?" After Jesus had gone from them into heaven, they were beaten with rods and stoned, and in all sorts of perils among false brethren (II. Cor. 11: 24-27). "Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you." Such men are called "trimmers"; they are neither honest nor honorable. Diogenes Laertius, when he was told that all men were praising him, exclaimed, "Why, what evil have I done?"

The Teachings of the Golden Text

The words were uttered by Jesus himself, not on the Mount of Beatitudes, but some months afterward, to a great crowd of hearers, when he spoke the parable of the foolish rich man who pulled down his barns that he might build greater ones to accommodate his increased harvest. He thus laid up treasure for himself, but had no thought of being rich toward God. Jesus' comment upon this was: "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of things which he possesseth" (the Golden Text).

At a later time, probably about three months before his crucifixion, when he was teaching and preaching in Perea, Jesus had something to say about another foolish rich man. He was "clothed in purple and fine linen," the most gorgeous and expensive raiment of that time. The linen was worth more than twice its weight in gold. His purple garments were such as kings wore, indicating both pride and luxury. Some twentieth century rich people have great compassion on the poor, and make a noble use of their money for the relief and uplift of their less fortunate fellow creatures. But not so that first century rich man. He spurned the poor, and allowed a beggar to lie at his gate so hungry that he would gladly have eaten the crumbs under the rich man's table. But such conditions do not last forever. The beggar died, and so did the rich man; and then it was the rich man's turn to beg: "Send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water and cool my tongue," for then he saw the beggar whom he would not go out to his gate to see; saw him happy, very near to the heavenly land, with good men who had gone before, and with the angels. "There is no crossing over from where we are in this happy place to the sorrowful place of torment where you are," was the answer made by Abraham, the friend of God. Still the man begged, not for water, but that Lazarus might be sent to his brothers who were not dead, to warn them against selfishness. But again Abraham answered "No." Let us be sure to read the whole story as we find it in Luke 16: 19-31. Then let us repeat over and over again the Golden Text: "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of things which he possesseth."

The Rich Young Ruler

There is another story of a rich man that we would do well to consider at this time. He was a rich young ruler, and his heart had been so touched by the preaching of Jesus that his desires were toward heaven. He came to Jesus with the question, "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" Jesus received him tenderly, for it is said "Jesus, beholding him, loved him." He was an upright young man, for, as he said, he had "kept the law from his youth up." "One thing thou lackest: go sell what thou hast and give it to the poor, then come and follow me," answered Jesus. But the young man turned away; he loved his riches too much to do that! And after he had gone, Jesus said to his apostles: "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God!"

The Uses of Rich Men in a Republic

Some years ago Frederic Harrison wrote an article for the Forum on this subject. We will now quote some sentences from it, because neither rich men nor their obligations to society have gone out of date. Mr. Harrison says: "Why do we not make better use of our rich men? We waste them and let them run to seed anyhow, a burden to themselves and a nuisance to the public. We ought to utilize them and make citizens out of them. . . . Many a man who has inherited millions is gnawed with envy as he watches a practical man turning an honest penny. How he would like to earn an honest penny! He never did; he never will; and he feels like a dyspeptic invalid watching a hearty beggar enjoying a bone or a crust. Many a rich man is capable of better things; but he does not know how to begin!" Mr. Harrison suggests a restoration of the liturgies, the public services of rich men as they were organized in Greek republics. He says: "At Athens the liturgies were legal and constitutional offices imposed periodically and according to a regular order by each local community on citizens rated as having a capital of more than a given amount. . . . It always remained a public office, a duty to be filled by taste, skill, personal effort and public spirit. Rich men contended for the office. The chief ambition of a rich man came to be that of making splendid gifts to his fellow citizens, and theaters, stadiums, colonnades, aqueducts, gardens, libraries, museums, pictures, statues—all were showered upon favorite cities by wealthy men who possessed or coveted the name of citizen." A few multimillionaires in our American Republic have made public benefactions. May their tribe increase! The gift of a public hospital or a school building is always in order.

When visiting in Cairo in Egypt, we saw an eager crowd gathered around a water-seller; each person had a cup in his or her hand. The water-seller cried, "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters; come, drink, without money and without price." Knowing that water-sellers always expected each person to pay a small coin for a cup of water, we made inquiries about the free water, and our attention was directed to a rich man standing by, and we were told that he had paid for the skin of water (a goat skin made into a leather bottle). It was expected that each person who received a cup of water would offer a prayer for the rich donor. That same skin water-bottle was purchased by us and now hangs up in our home as a reminder of how the rich may bless the poor, and in the end themselves be blessed. This is the only way to solve the problem of Dives and Lazarus.

The Lesson Taught to Children

A teacher told this story to a large class of small children, and then asked them which they would rather be They were slow to answer, because they would not choose to be beggars, neither were they ready to say they wished to be bad rich men. One boy, more thoughtful than the others, replied that he "would like to be a good Dives." Then the teacher showed a penny and a gold piece, and told them how much more the gold piece could buy than a penny, and then asked them if they would like to be like the penny, or like the gold piece. All of course said they would choose to be like the gold piece. Then the comparison was made between pennies and beggars, gold pieces and rich people, and the teacher tried to impress the thought that they should desire to be rich in order that they might be of much help to others.

Dr. Broughton's Remarkable Career

BY REV. J. J. HALL, D.D., Who Ordained Him as a Pastor

DR. LEN G. BROUGHTON, of Atlanta, Ga., has just left the United States to take charge of Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, London. There is now nothing very unusual for a preacher to leave one country for another; many have come to this land, and not a few have gone from us to the old country. But the departure of Dr. Broughton has awakened a general interest the like of which has probably never been witnessed before. Atlanta was so stirred that outside of his own church a large sum of money was offered him by the citizens, if he would consent to remain with them. His own church promised him a year's vacation, would keep his pulpit well supplied, and unanimously entreated him not to leave them.

On Sunday, March 31, in his home city, Raleigh, N. C., a most remarkable meeting took place. Thousands came to hear his farewell address before leaving for England. They knew him and had known him from a child. They knew of his early struggles for an education; his brave mastery over great difficulties, the splendid success which has come to him and the great work which he has done.

It was while pastor of the Tabernacle Church of Atlanta that I was chosen by him, at the Baptist Church of Reidsville, N. C., to preach his ordination sermon. He was then a young physician in Reidsville. I little thought of the great future awaiting the young man. Not a few of his nearest relatives thought he was making the mistake of his life in leaving the practice of medicine for the Gospel. His first pastorate was in Winston-Salem, N. C., then at Roanoke, Va. But Atlanta became the field of his greatest work. He built one of the largest and best equipped churches in the United States. His annual convention brought speakers from across the seas. His hospital has been a blessing to thousands of sufferers; his Margaret Home a house of hope to the unfortunate ones; and a great host of workers have been trained under his skilful hand.

The church to which Dr. Broughton goes is one of the best known in London. The eccentric and famous Rowland Hill was one time its pastor, though not at its present location. Newman Hall was its pastor for many years. John Ruskin was the designer of its present stately building, and of its many towers one was erected by the American friends of Newman Hall. To-day it is one of the busiest churches in all London. I well remember supplying there a few years since, when F. B. Meyer was its pastor. It was then a hive of busy workers, with several Sunday Schools and preaching stations in its care. Great crowds of people are all about that place of worship, and Dr. Broughton will find multitudes at the very doors of his church.

Good wishes and the earnest prayers of thousands will follow him as he takes up his great work in the world's metropolis.

Keep in Touch with Roosevelt

William Allen White says:

"The Outlook has become the forum for public discussion in America. Week after week for a year or more The Outlook's editorial page has been discussed. The Outlook has made a place for itself distinctive and peculiar. Nothing else like it—since, perhaps, Greeley's day — has been known in America. It has made editorial news, and the Press Associations carry its views and discussions as regularly as they carry the market reports. Theodore Roosevelt . . . is doing as much for the country as though he were President. He is directing the thought of the people into straight channels that will lead to wise action. But The Outlook—a happy compromise between all the good of a newspaper and all that is fine in magazines—has become a function of the American government as it now exists. It is the greatest organ of public sentiment in the country today. No leader of American sentiment or public feeling can ignore it. For now abideth these four—the executive, the legislature, the judiciary, and The Outlook. And the greatest of these is The Outlook." —From the Emporia (Kansas) Daily Gazette

Lady Bountiful of Craig-y-Nos

ADELINA PATTI, the Baroness Cederstrom, and long famed as the world's sweetest singer, dwells in her castle of Craig-y-Nos in South Wales like a queen in an enchanted domain of fairyland. The castle is situated in a valley, at the foot of great rambling mountains. Its mass of buildings looks pure white in the distance, thrown against a dark background, and occasionally half hidden by the shrubbery of evergreen; but on a nearer approach, one remarks how much the hand of man has done to beautify this otherwise desolate spot. Craig-y-Nos means "The Rock of Night," and it is aptly named. The huge castle, with its strong oaks and sheltering forests for miles about, looks as though it might last for centuries.

Patti's first public appearance occurred when she was thirteen years old. It was at an entertainment on June 19, 1858, for the benefit of a church in Mount Vernon, N. Y. That place was little Adelina's home, her father having had the distinction of building the first brick house there. The town was then a very small suburban village, while to-day it is a city, and one of the largest in Westchester County.

It was in this town that Adelina passed her school days. One of her playmates still recalls the day she went alone to the schoolroom door to ask for admittance. The teacher promptly replied to the little dark-eyed child: "This is a pay school!"

"Yes, me know," replied little Adelina, "but me sing."

And she was so persistent that the teacher invited her to call again, which she did—and sang. She was immediately entered in the school, and thereafter was the life and light of the teacher and children.

Madame Patti's full name was Adela Juana Maria Patti. She was born in Madrid on February 10, 1843. Her father was Salvatore Calama Patti, a Sicilian, and her mother a Roman by birth, Caterina Chiesi. Both were singers of note. Patti made her début in New York City at the old Academy of Music November 24, 1859, as Lucia. Since that time she has had only to wish for any of the world's good gifts, and they have fallen to her like drops of rain.

The writer of these lines once had the honor and pleasure of visiting the great singer in her castle at Craig-y-Nos. If there is one thing more charming than another, it is to be alone with Madame Patti for an hour and listen to the tales she tells, in her own pretty, spontaneous fashion, sometimes smiling sadly and again gladly, as one incident after another comes to mind of her early childhood. It was at the very tender age of five or six years that the little Adelina had her first glimpse of a real audience through a hole in the scenery. That night, remembering all that she had seen and heard, she stole out of bed when her parents were asleep and enacted the roles of the prima donna and, at the end of her performance, threw make-believe wreaths at herself.

That Adelina was a remarkable child cannot be doubted, but she was much like other little girls in her play, rolling her hoop and playing games. She relates that while singing at a private entertainment at the age of seven, she noticed a small girl in the audience whom she knew. Looking toward the child she interrupted her song to say: "Wait until I am finished here and I will go out and play!" Then she continued her singing.

Madame Patti, in her retirement, is indeed a "Lady Bountiful." The Welsh people's love for her amounts almost to adoration. It is the duty of her ever-faithful and inseparable companion, Caroline—they have been together thirty years—to look out for and receive reports about any case of sickness or destitution in the neighborhood, and to act upon it immediately. Madame Patti takes a long walk every day. All the roads in the vicinity of her castle at Craig-y-Nos are finely kept, and the views are superb. On one of her walks, she became thirsty and called at a peasant's cottage by the wayside to ask for a glass of milk. After she had finished, she opened her purse to pay, but the woman refused and asked:

"But will your ladyship sing one of your beautiful songs?"

A feeble voice from within was heard calling.

"That is my invalid daughter," the woman explained.

Patti entered the humble house and sang "Home, Sweet Home."

"Sometime will you please sing that again?" pleaded the poor sick girl.

Patti went again and sang the sweet old song and offered words of comfort.

In Madame Patti's Welsh garden grows a heart-shaped bed of violets. No one is ever allowed to pluck a flower, nor to receive flowers from any hand but that of the great singer herself. This is a strange sentiment. There is such an abundance of flowers surrounding her at her home as would be no easy task to duplicate.

The great singer is exceedingly fond of pets, her favorite being her Irish terrier, "Ginger." She has no less than seventeen beautiful parrots, all of gorgeous plumage, and many of them are quite untamed; but they are all great talkers. This fondness for parrots is one of a few traits that are characteristically Italian.

In the center of her castle she has had constructed a pretty little chapel, wherein all the seats and furnishings are of carved oak, with silk plush. In the diva's bedroom there are many evidences of her religious nature. In this room, and indeed all over the castle, one remarks the quantity of elegantly embroidered pillows and cushions. These are all the work of this wonderful woman herself, for Patti is very deft as the result of long practice. She also paints extremely well on tapestry and canvas, and specimens of her art are numerous about the place. She has a collection of beautiful musical instruments, all of which she can play.

Her life at home or abroad has always been one of activity. The entire castle is generously stored with rare old furniture from many countries, and one may see on every side statues and statuettes of the singer herself by the most renowned of modern sculptors, as well as life-size paintings, most of them the gifts of great artists. There are also rare collections of curious things, some of which are exhibited only to specially favored guests. The most valuable of these is a collection of crowns, some of laurel and faded ribbons, dated back to Patti's childhood. Others are made of silver and gold, set with precious stones. One, the gift of a Russian Czar, is inlaid with diamonds, rubies and emeralds. There are other wonderfully beautiful gifts from sovereigns and nobles. The whole collection is extensive and priceless.

In an American city lives a poet of the South who, all his life, has never tired of writing verse to Patti and her wonderful voice. He is now bent with years, but he still continues to write of the Queen of Song. The following lines were written in memory of her singing "The Last Rose of Summer":

Then I saw the withered rose-leaves fall quivering to the ground,
And angels must have listened to the low and plaintive sound
That came drifting, drifting, to me and fell upon my ears
Like snowflakes turned to music, and then melting into tears.
And all the while sweet harmonies crept down into my heart
And nestled in a home from which they never can depart.
For as life's ever changing tides of joy and sorrow roll
The memory of her voice will still keep singing in my soul.

Bless the little treasure. She'll be a young lady before we know it.— Mother must keep young—must be both parent and chum. Baby's dainty cheeks will be carefully guarded—Mother's girlish complexion retained by the use of Palmolive.

How Palm and Olive Oils Have Made PALMOLIVE Unlike Any Other Soap

The ancient Orientals have taught a mighty lesson on the care of the skin. For ages past the famous beauties of the Orient have possessed marvelous complexions, as a result of using Palm and Olive Oils.

PALMOLIVE Soap owes its splendid cleansing and beautifying properties to this secret of the Orient. Palmolive is, therefore, quite different from all others. It is more than a mere soap.

Palmolive Does More Than These Oils Alone Can Do

Now, after 36 years of study, of determining just what is needed in soap, what heretofore has been utterly lacking, we have perfected this secret of the far East. We have blended these two beautifying oils in a pure, cleansing soap.

Thus Palmolive does more than any other soap can do—what these oils alone are quite unable to do.

Palmolive Cream

A pure white cream, manufactured in our own laboratories, after an original formula.

Penetrates and softens the skin, cleansing the deepest pores. Leaves the skin in the peak of condition.

You will note a marked improvement in your complexion the first day you use this efficient skin beautifier. A wonderful aid to the splendid effects of Palmolive Soap.

Practically every drug store in the United States sells Palmolive Soap and Palmolive Cream. Your druggist will recommend it.

Send the band from a cake of Palmolive Soap and we will send you a generous facsimile jar of Palmolive Cream, postpaid.

Price 50c

Fresh, Green Hue From Olive Oil

Palmolive is perfectly pure. Contains no free alkali. No artificial color is used. The olive oil used in Palmolive gives this soap its delicate green coloring.

By this purity the natural oils of the skin are protected and the skin is kept soft and smooth.

This is why Palmolive is used by so many mothers for bathing Baby. If the child's skin is properly cleansed and nourished from the start, in later years it will show the good effects of the early Palmolive treatment.

A Pure, Oriental Fragrance

Palmolive's delicate odor is faintly, yet delightfully fragrant. In Palmolive a strong perfume is not necessary. The dainty odor is one of sweetness and purity—a wholesome breath from the Orient.

Palmolive Conquers Hard Water

These Oriental oils make Palmolive lather freely in HARD water as well as soft. This feature alone makes it doubly valuable where soft water is not plentiful. Try a sample of Palmolive in hard water—then try some other soap and note the difference! See Sample offer.

Palmolive Lasts Longer

When you try Palmolive you will be delighted—not only because it is so much better, but because it lasts longer. It remains firm even when worn to wafer thinness.

Palmolive's surprisingly low cost compared with its high quality, its wide variety of uses, its wonder-working effect upon all complexions, its long lasting ability, makes it extremely economical.

Ivory Soap in the Garden

As a great writer has said, "Gardening is the purest of human pleasures and the greatest refreshment to the spirits of man." No wonder that they who love to grow things are ever striving for finer effects. No wonder that they devour eagerly every word, printed or spoken, that will help them to better results.

Gardeners everywhere, therefore, will welcome to their store of information this fact: Ivory Soap is invaluable as an insecticide and fungicide.

Those who already know this have found that Ivory Soap is in no sense a mere substitute for the usual mixtures and preparations but that it has many distinct advantages appealing to amateurs and professionals alike. It is cheaper. It is just as effective. It is easier to apply. It does not harm bark or foliage. It cannot clog or corrode sprayers. It is not dangerous to use.

While there are many favorite ways of using Ivory Soap as a preventive and check against plant pests, the directions below, we think, will secure the best results. Follow these suggestions, anticipate the coming of the pests and you will have no regrets.

We also give some other uses for Ivory Soap outside the house—uses not directly connected with the garden but of such value as to merit widespread publication.

The Procter & Gamble Co.

An Insecticide and Fungicide

Flowers Shave fine one large bar of Ivory Soap. Add three gallons of lukewarm water and six drops of pure lemon oil. Stir well and, before the water has a chance to cool, spray the plant.

Spray it thoroughly, not only at the top of the foliage, but under the plant. Do not be afraid of giving an overdose.

This treatment is invaluable for checking mildew on roses, and red spider and stem rot on carnations.

Grapes and Vegetables Make a slightly weaker solution than the above, using one large bar of Ivory Soap to four gallons of water and four drops of lemon oil. In the vineyard, this will check thrips, phylloxera, peronospora, mildew, etc. Spray vegetables before black fly, cut worms and caterpillar pests appear.

To Keep Flowers in Good Condition

Roses, Carnations, Violets and Plants with Similar Leaves Shave one pound (equivalent to one large and one small bar) of Ivory Soap very fine and dissolve in one gallon of boiling water. When dissolved, add twenty-four gallons of cold water and use at once. To make a small quantity, dissolve one-sixth of a small cake of Ivory Soap in a pint of boiling water and add a gallon and a half of cold water.

Apply with a spray, atomizer, watering can, or old whisk broom. Be careful to reach the under as well as the upper sides of the leaves. Half an hour after applying, rinse off the solution with clear, soft water.

Begonias, Fuchsias, Ferns and All Tender and Bulbous Plants Add a third more water to the foregoing solution so it will be about three-fourths as strong. Apply and rinse the same way. Don't expect a single application to rid plants of all insect pests. It may be necessary to apply the solution several times at intervals of three days.

To Keep Fingernails Clean, though Working in the Garden

Before going into the garden, rub a moistened cake of Ivory Soap over the ends of the fingernails, so as to fill the spaces under them.

To Keep Harness in Good Condition

Apply Ivory Soap Paste (see directions below) with a woolen cloth, using no water. Let it remain on the harness a few minutes. Rub dry and polish with a soft cloth. Olive or neats-foot oil will help keep the leather soft and pliable.

How to Make Ivory Soap Paste

Shave one large cake of Ivory Soap into three quarts of water or two small cakes into four quarts. Do this with a knife, vegetable grater or food chopper. Keep nearly, but not quite, at boiling point for about fifteen minutes, or until the soap is perfectly dissolved. When cool, it will be like jelly. Keep in china or glass jars.

We cannot emphasize too strongly the value of Ivory Soap Paste in the kitchen, in the laundry and for general household use. It is economical. It is convenient. It can be used for an almost endless variety of purposes. In a few minutes' time and with very little trouble, one can make enough Ivory Soap Paste to last a week or a month.

Next Month's Advertisement of Ivory Soap will deal with the washing of Colored Clothes

"TITANIC" SURVIVORS REACH NEW YORK

They Tell the Full Story of the Great Disaster Which Cost Over 1,500 Lives

THE thought and feeling of the civilized world were centered on Thursday evening, April 18, upon the spot in New York City where a hushed multitude awaited the steamer Carpathia, slipping silent up the harbor to her dock with the survivors of the great ship Titanic, which lay two thousand fathoms deep under the cruel Atlantic. Once more the great sea had sneered at the little plans of men, and added to her long and bitter list of horrors this supreme tragedy of the deep. Back from the sea the rescue vessel crept, bearing bruised bodies and broken hearts, but a pitifully scant remnant of seven hundred and five souls from the two thousand two hundred and eight who had sailed smilingly from England seven short days before on the maiden voyage of the queenly vessel that had been, in her building and launching, the wonder of the world.

Millions could send only their thoughts and prayers to the pier; thousands crowded near; a few hundreds were allowed to reach the wharf itself. One by one, two by two, the sad survivors came down the gangplank; many were carried down in stretchers toward the waiting ambulances; tears of heartbreak and tears of joy mingled as loved ones met; there were not many reunions unblent with agony of grief for some other who lay dead at the bottom of the sea. Mixed, too, with the grief, was the beauty of charity. The sorrow had made nations and classes neighbors again; in the mass of automobiles wending their cautious way, with lamp and horn, through the police lines and crowds, were many belonging to families of wealth and high position who had come to give aid and to offer a home to those in distress; sisters of charity, deaconesses, nurses, Salvation Army officers, were busy caring for the sick and making provision for the clothing, housing and feeding of the destitute.

From the broken stories gathered from lips of the surviving passengers, from formal and informal reports of officers and employees of the vessel, these facts stand out as the plain tale of the disaster.

The night of Sunday, April 14, was clear and starlit. Through the vast field of ice-floes the giant steamer was driven at a speed of eighteen knots or more. There was no fear—no apprehension of danger at hand. Captain Smith had been warned by wireless from the S. S. Mesaba about eight P. M. of the vicinity of dangerous bergs, but evidently thought little of it.

At ten o'clock P.M. many of the passengers had retired. First Officer Murdock was on the bridge, Captain Smith being at a banquet which was being given in the great dining-saloon, where a brilliant company was assembled. Suddenly, at 11.35 o'clock, there was a jar that was felt throughout the entire length of the great ship. The startled banqueters instinctively rose as from a Belshazzar's feast, and the captain rushed to the deck.

Then the horror began. To those on deck, the iceberg, which had been struck a glancing blow, seemed to be less than a hundred feet high. It seemed as though the liner had slid on to a ledge of the ice, hung there an instant and then slipped back into the water. In that one brief moment of frightful impact, the iceberg had done its deadly work upon the giant of steel. Officer Murdock had reversed her port propeller and thrown over her helm to clear the berg, but too late. A large portion of her keel was ripped away; her watertight compartments were rendered useless; there was a huge, gaping hole in her starboard side.

Already, by the captain's order, the wireless had begun sending out calls for help, but the responses were from vessels too far off to afford speedy aid. Every moment the peril increased. The passengers were called on deck and directed to put on life-preservers. Half an hour later — about 12.10 A.M.—all sleeping passengers were awakened and the command was given to the crew to prepare the lifeboats. A shudder ran through the crowds who had gathered on the big deck. There were only twenty lifeboats—hardly enough to hold one-third of the 2,208 souls on the mortally wounded liner.

After this, the narrative grows darkly tragic. The engines were silent and useless, and the great vessel swayed with an ever-increasing list forward. As the lifeboats were launched one by one, the order was passed "Women and children first." There were many heroic incidents, many splendid illustrations of unselfish devotion. The men in the first and second cabins made no effort to save themselves, although nearly all had put on life-belts. They were content to see the women and children put off safely. Some of the steerage men tried to storm the lifeboats, but were forced back at the pistol's point. Shots were fired to warn and control the men. Some declare the shots were fired over the men's heads, others that a few of them were killed; but taken as a whole, the conduct of the officers, crew and men passengers was one of gallant magnanimity toward the helpless and the weak. Real heroes there were in plenty, and the individual stories of their courage in the face of death, in those trying hours, will long be remembered. There were heroines,too, and not a few faithful wives chose to die beside their husbands rather than be separated.

It was no easy task, launching the lifeboats. Of the twenty boats on the Titanic, four were collapsible. The port side boats touched the water without capsizing, but some of the starboard boats upset. Their occupants, however, were picked up by other boats. Mr. Bruce Ismay, President of the International Mercantile Marine, which owned the Titanic, took charge of the launching and himself left the sinking steamer in one of the boats.

Soon after the last of the boats had gone, the Titanic began to settle. Some men jumped from her deck into the sea. Captain Smith and his officers stuck to the ship to the end, going down with her. From the boats the closing scene of the tragedy was witnessed with an agonizing interest. The big liner's boilers exploded, and she broke in half amidships, the forward half disappearing bow first. Crowds of men could be seen on her afterdeck, their figures silhouetted against the sky. Scores, if not hundreds, leaped overboard and were drawn down by the suction of the sinking ship. Then the hull of the liner was seen to stand almost on end for a moment. Even at that awful instant, those in the nearest boats say they could hear the strains of the Titanic's band, playing "Nearer, My God, to Thee." Then with a final plunge she disappeared.

Some of the boats rowed back and from among a mass of floating débris rescued three men, one of whom (a man weighing over 200 pounds and who may have been Major Butt) died almost immediately. Next twenty people were found, all of whom had miraculously come up from the depths and taken shelter on one of the steamer's loose rafts. All these were rescued. Over one hundred dead bodies came up, almost all of them with life-belts strapped on. Some of those rescued from the raft say that Captain Smith, just before the Titanic broke in two, walked aft and jumped into the sea. One of his officers flung him a rope, which he declined. His last audible words were "Let me go!"

It was daylight when the Carpathia came upon the scene and took the occupants of the lifeboats on board. The gloomy sea tragedy was over.

The Story of the "Titanic's" Surviving Wireless Operator

The following remarkable account of the wreck and rescue was related to a New York Times reporter and to Mr. Marconi, by Harold Bride, the surviving wireless operator of the Titanic:
[Copyright, 1912, by the New York Times Co.]

I WAS standing by Phillips, telling him to go to bed, when the captain put his head in the cabin.

"'We've struck an iceberg,' the captain said, 'and I'm having an inspection made to tell what it has done for us. You better get ready to send out a call for assistance. But don't send it until I tell you.'

"The captain went away and in ten minutes, I should estimate the time, he came back. We could hear a terrible confusion outside, but there was not the least thing to indicate that there was any trouble. The wireless was working perfectly.

"'Send the call for assistance,' ordered the captain, barely putting his head in the door.

"'What call should I send?' Phillips asked.

"'The regulation international call for help. Just that.'

"Then the captain was gone. Phillips began to send 'C. Q. D.' He flashed away at it and we joked while he did so. All of us made light of the disaster. . . . The Carpathia answered our signal. We told her our positon and told her we were sinking by the head. The operator went to tell the captain, and in five minutes returned and told us that the captain of the Carpathia was putting about and heading for us. . . . Every few minutes Phillips would send me to the captain with little messages.

"I noticed as I came back from one trip that they were putting off women and children in lifeboats. I noticed that the list forward was increasing. Phillips told me the wireless was growing weaker. The captain came and told us our engine rooms were taking water and that the dynamos might not last much longer. We sent that word to the Carpathia.

"I went out on deck and looked around. The water was pretty close up to the boat deck. There was a great scramble aft, and how poor Phillips worked through it I don't know. . . . I looked out. The boat deck was awash. Phillips clung on sending and sending. He clung on for about ten minutes or maybe fifteen minutes after the captain had released him. The water was then coming into our cabin. While he worked something happened I hate to tell about. I was back in my room getting Phillips's money for him, and as I looked out the door I saw a stoker, or somebody from below decks, leaning over Phillips from behind. He was too busy to notice what the man was doing. The man was slipping the life-belts off Phillips's back. . . . I suddenly felt a passion not to let that man die a decent sailor's death. I wished he might have stretched rope or walked a plank. I did my duty. I hope I finished him. I don't know. We left him on the cabin floor of the wireless room and he was not moving. . . . From aft came the tunes of the band. It was a ragtime tune. Then there was 'Autumn.' Phillips ran aft and that was the last I saw of him. Then I was washed overboard. There were men all around me—hundreds of them. The sea was dotted with them, all depending on their life-belts. I felt I simply had to get away from the ship. She was a beautiful sight.

"Smoke and sparks were rushing out of her funnel. There must have been an explosion, but we had heard none. We only saw the big stream of sparks. The ship was gradually turning on her nose—just like a duck does that goes down for a dive. I had only one thing on my mind—to get away from the suction. The band was still playing. I guess all of the band went down.

"They were playing 'Autumn' then. I swam with all my might. I suppose I was one hundred and fifty feet away when the Titanic, on her nose, with her after-quarter sticking straight up in the air, began to settle—slowly.

"When at last the waves washed over her rudder there wasn't the least bit of suction I could feel.

"I felt, after a little while, like sinking. I was very cold. I saw a boat of some kind, bottom up, near me and put all my strength into an effort to swim to it. It was hard work. I was all done when a hand reached out from the boat and pulled me aboard. . . . As we floated around on the capsized boat and I kept straining my eyes for a ship's lights, somebody said, 'Don't the rest of you think we ought to pray?' The man who made the suggestion asked what the religion of the others was. Each man called out his religion. One was a Catholic, one a Methodist, one a Presbyterian.

"It was decided the most appropriate prayer for all was the Lord's Prayer. We spoke it over in chorus with the man who first suggested that we pray as the leader.

"Some splendid people saved us. They had a right-side-up boat, and it was full to its capacity. Yet they came to us and loaded us all into it. I saw some lights off in the distance and knew a steamship was coming to our aid."

Pathos and Heroism of the Last Moments as Told by Rescued

Isidor Straus, the Heroic Old Merchant, and His Wife Go Down Together

MR. H. HAVENS, of New York City, who was in the Titanic's fifteenth boat, said he saw Mr. and Mrs. Straus standing in an embrace on the deck as the boat was lowered that took away Mrs. Astor.

Colonel Astor, who had been watching his wife as she was rowed away with the others in that craft, walked up to Mr. Straus and his wife and urged Mrs. Straus to hurry aboard a life-raft while there was still time.

Her husband also was urging her, but she continued to cling to him.

"'No! No! I will not go!' she cried to her husband. 'I cannot leave you.'

"Then some one said: 'You both can go. There's room for both.'

"'As long as there is a woman on this ship I will not leave. They are the first and must be looked after. When they are safe then comes man. But not until all the women are in the boats will I put my foot in a lifeboat.'

"'You are an old man, Mr. Straus,' somebody said.

"'I am not too old to sacrifice myself for a woman.'"—New York Evening Sun.

Supreme Courage in the Crisis

HENRY B. HARRIS, the theatrical manager, was one of the men who showed superb courage in the crisis. When the lifeboats were first being filled, and before there was any panic or extraordinary excitement, he had been assisted into one of them at the side of his wife before the boat was lowered away.

"Women first!" shouted one of the ship's officers. Mr. Harris glanced up and saw that the remark was addressed to him.

"All right," he replied, coolly. "Good-by, my dear," he said as he kissed his wife, pressed her a moment to his breast and then climbed back to the Titanic's deck.—New York Herald.

Famous Journalist Did Not Realize the Danger and Returned to His Stateroom

WILLIAM T. STEAD, the famous English journalist, was so little alarmed that he calmly discussed with one of the passengers the probable height of the iceberg after the Titanic had shot into it. According to this passenger, who was among those taken off in the boats, Mr. Stead, believing there was not the slightest danger of the vessel foundering, returned to his stateroom and presumably died there.—New York Herald.

John Jacob Astor Faces Death Calmly

ONE of the passengers, describing the consummate courage of Colonel Astor's bearing, said:

"'Come,' he said to his wife, 'you must go. There is no way out of it and time is flying.'

"'No! No!' Mrs. Astor cried, 'I cannot go and leave you on the ship.'

"The officers were getting restless and before they had a chance to grab her up bodily Colonel Astor embraced his wife and kissed her.

"'I don't want to go,' she said repeatedly.

"'But you must,' said Astor, who finally dragged her to the lifeboat. He kissed her a last farewell, and as she was helped into the boat Colonel Astor tried to force a smile and assure her with:

"'Don't worry, dear; all will be well.'

It was the most impressive display of courage I have ever seen. Really I can't describe it.

"After Mrs. Astor was put in the boat I saw Colonel Astor myself help many other women to safety. To me it seemed as if he forgot himself entirely and had only one thought in mind—saving the women. He worked along with the crew. It was a wonderful thing."—New York Evening Sun.

Robert W. Daniel, of Philadelphia. Tells the Story of the Wreck

"THE passengers, officers and crew (of the Carpathia) gave up their staterooms, clothing and comforts for our benefit. All honor to them.

"The English Board of Trade passengers' certificate on board the Titanic allowed for a total of approximately 3,500. The same certificate called for lifeboat accommodation for approximately 950 in the following boats: Fourteen large lifeboats, two smaller boats and four collapsible boats.

"It was perhaps an hour and forty-five minutes that we stood about before the ship sank. The lights went out an hour and a half after she started sinking. I think there was no perceptible shock. I and there was no sign of any confusion. All the time the water was gradually creeping up. There was no sensation except that you could see the surface of the water getting nearer to you.

"I kept watching the water gradually coming up to where I was. I was on a deck which was the top promenade deck. I managed to stay there until the deck was flush with water."

"Did anybody get hysterical?" was asked.

"Not until the boats got away," he replied. "But then, my God! to listen to the screams that I heard for the next four or five hours was a terrible experience. Why, we brought in on the Carpathia sixteen widows, each of whom was under twenty-two years of age."—New York Sun.

Insect Foes of Farm and Orchard

Liberating Imported Parasites of the Gipsy Moth in the Massachusetts Woods

Spraying to Kill the Young Gipsy Caterpillars on Oak Trees Near Boston

Spraying for the Pear Thrips in the Orchards of California

ONE interesting matter which came before the Insecticide and Fungicide Board (mentioned in a previous article) for consideration was the definition of the expression, "insect powder." Of course, there are a number of powdered substances on the market which are widely used as insecticides, such as powdered hellebore, powdered tobacco, and the powdered flowers of certain species of chrysanthemum, the latter being known as Persian Insect Powder, Dalmatian Insect Powder, and so on. The Insecticide Board has held that the term "insect powder," when used without qualification, however, in future must be used to signify an insecticide made from the powdered flower heads of three specified species of chrysanthemum. Now it happens that the chrysanthemum powders have been very widely adulterated, and a frequent adulteration is to include the powdered stems with the powdered flowers. This results in the weakening of the efficacy of the powder. The Board has ruled that where there is any stem powder adulteration this fact should appear on the label. In the future, then, when one buys an article labeled "insect powder" he is sure that it is the efficacious powdered flower heads of chrysanthemum, and that if the word "stems" is on the label the powder is not of the very best.

So the present outlook is that the government will care for the interests of the people in this direction in the future, and that the very great amount of money hitherto wasted in buying useless substances will be saved.

But after all, to return to the original line of thought of my earlier article, untrained people must not use their own heads in this matter of insect remedies. It is a simple matter to get expert advice through published pamphlets without any expense other than a postal card or a two-cent stamp. This applies not only to well-known insect pests of which everybody knows the name, but also to pests that are unknown to the sender. In the latter cases it will be necessary to send specimens, either to the State Agricultural Experiment Station or to the State Agricultural College of your own State—and this should be done by preference—or to the Bureau of Entomology of the U. S. Department of Agriculture at Washington. The best way to send most insects is in living condition, with a supply of food, in a strong wooden box. Many, however, can be sent in alcohol in a mailing tube. The chances are a hundred to one that the insects sent in, providing they are doing considerable damage, will be well known to the entomologist of the State Agricultural Experiment Station or to the experts at Washington, and not only this, but the chances are equally great that printed information will be at hand and available for distribution, and that a prompt reply will be received from which all needed information can be gained, and that sound remedial measures can be instituted.

Moreover, the State Experiment Stations and the Bureau of Entomology at Washington may be appealed to at any time with questions about any insect whatever, even when it does not appear to be injurious. Persons whose curiosity is aroused by some strange looking creature can write to headquarters and learn all about it, without even enclosing return postage, since the government has the postal franking privilege, as do also the State stations, which are really supported, at least in part, by governmental appropriations.

So far we have spoken only of poisons among the remedies for injurious insects, but there are many other remedies which may be applied to advantage in the case of different species. In fact, when a new insect enemy appears, there are three questions immediately to be asked. First, is it an insect that comes from some other country? If this should be the case, an effort should be made to import its parasites and natural enemies from the country of its origin. The second question is, can we, after understanding perfectly its life history and method of attack, vary in some degree the method of cultivating the crop which it attacks, so as to interfere with the natural development of the insect and reduce its damage to a minimum? Third, can we hold it in check by applying poisons, or by destroying it mechanically in the interim while we are investigating the first two questions, or perhaps so effectively that we shall not need to investigate further?

In regard to the first question and the method which it suggests, there have been several brilliant successes. The most notable one was the importation of the Australian ladybird beetle into California to destroy the white scale in the late eighties; and this was followed by the carriage of the same species of beetle, with equally good results, to Portugal, to Italy, to South Africa, and quite recently, to Formosa, in all cases destroying the same scale insect. Another instance was the importation from Australia of certain parasites of the sugar-cane leaf-hopper into Hawaii, which is said to have resulted in the reduction of the numbers of the leaf-hoppers to a negligible quantity. A gigantic experiment of the same kind is now being carried on in the importation of the parasites and natural enemies of the gipsy moth and the brown-tail moth from all parts of Europe and from Japan into the New England States. A number of species have already been introduced and acclimatized, and admirable results are expected from this work.

A striking example of the value of the second method, and a very simple one, was the remedy proposed in 1879 against the clover-seed midge. This little insect, laying its eggs in the flower heads of clover, destroyed the seed crop and reduced the hay yield. In the part of the country infested by this insect it was the custom to cut two crops of clover, once, from June 20 to July 10, when the clover is in full bloom, for hay alone, and again, in the latter part of September, or from that time until the first of November, depending upon the time of cutting the first crop, for seed. It was found, on studying the life history of the insect, that the first brood of maggots attained their full growth about the latter part of June, and left the heads to go into the ground. The conclusion was obvious that, were the first crop of clover cut in early June, the bulk of the first generation of the insect would be destroyed, and that at the expense of a slight reduction in his crop of hay, the farmer would enormously increase the prospects of his crop of seed; in fact, this system was followed so extensively for a while that the clover seed midge is no longer feared in most places.

Another example of the same kind is seen in the case of the famous cotton boll weevil, where it has been shown that by early planting with quickly maturing seed, widening the rows somewhat, forcing the crop until it has practically all been harvested by October, and then by cutting down or burying the stalks, a good crop is gained in spite of the presence of the weevil in numbers; and with the cutting down of the stalks in October, weevils, which would otherwise mature and hibernate, are destroyed, and the prospect for weevil damage the following season is very greatly lessened.

Remedies of the third class are the commonest, and consist of all the different preparations, including the different arsenical poisons to be used as sprays or as powders, all of the oil emulsions, the so-called miscible oil sprays, the lime-sulphur washes for the San José scale, as well as all of the mechanical devices, including lights for attracting the moths, plumbers' torches for burning insects in different stages, the so-called hopperdozers for use in the fields when young grasshoppers abound, and all of the other apparatus which, in one form or another, is used to destroy insects mechanically.

The State and government entomologists are not bound down to any one line of thought. They are exceptionally open-minded as a class, and they welcome new ideas from even untrained people, and spend much time investigating remedies for whose success there is even the slightest chance. In no country in the world is so much attention paid to the warfare against insects as in the United States, and American entomologists are now employed by several foreign governments and colonies, notably in Peru, in the Argentine Republic, in the British West Indies, Queensland, Cape Colony, and the Transvaal; while England, Japan, Russia, Mexico and Chile have sent trained men to the United States to study our methods of work.

"THEY ARE ALL AND MORE THAN I EXPECTED!"

I wish to express my appreciation of your book premiums. They are all and more than I expected. Your Almanac is truly an encyclopedia, and should be appreciated by all who value a good book. I certainly was agreeably surprised when I received the premiums, and thank you for them. My wish is that your valuable paper may increase until it reaches the millions.

Boldness at the Throne of Grace

TEXT: "Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy." Heb. 4: 16

BOLDNESS in prayer, intimates the apostle, springs from the realization of three great facts, focalized by the word "therefore." The first reason for such boldness lies in the fact that it is a Throne of Grace which we are approaching. Paul is the first so to describe it, and it has proved the most attractive characterization ever suggested. For a considerable time the term Mercy Seat was the most popular in the church.

> There is a place where spirits meet,
> Where friend holds fellowship with friend.
> A place than all besides more sweet.
> It is the blood-bought Mercy Seat.

But that is an Old Testament conception and must needs give precedence to this the New Testament representation. It emphasizes the attribute of God in which we chiefly trust when we come to him in prayer—his mercy; and greatly does it embolden us to know that he is compassionate and forgiving. But the thought of another quality is even more essential to confidence—his majesty and omnipotence. These are both symbolized by the throne. God's mercy, to be effective, must have sovereignty behind it. Sovereign grace alone can bring reassurance. And God's sovereignty, to attract and win us, must be gracious. Both conceptions are here in our author's picture, clear and distinct and impressive. It is a throne to which we come—stable, powerful, royal; but it is a throne of grace.

God's Grace Ever Sovereign

It is in prayer alone that God's throne assumes this aspect. That is to say, this side of heaven. There, of course, it will never have any other aspect. To the redeemed alone God's sovereignty is ever gracious and his grace ever sovereign. But until then the throne of God is never the throne of grace except to the one who prays. Out in nature what is it? The throne of majesty and awe. In all the language of the material universe, Huxley declares, there is no such word as pity. Back in the conscience of man what is it? The throne of righteousness—positive, exacting, relentless. "Thou shalt not," or "Thou shalt"—an absolute, austere voice. In the final judgment what is it? The throne of justice. "According to the deeds done here in the body, whether they be good or evil." But let a soul approach that throne in prayer, trusting in Jesus Christ, and it sees not the white light of judgment enveloping it as a cloud, not the blue light of majesty and power lying upon it like a forbidding haze, but the crimson glow of compassion, forbearance, pity, grace, resting like a halo above it. A welcome awaits him when he comes. Kindly audience is given him. The petitions he presents are graciously received. He brings with him a draft which the court of heaven has issued against itself and must redeem, or forfeit its honor and credit. He comes to the throne not to see a book of account resting upon it, or a scale of retribution sitting beside it, or a scepter of power lying across it, but an open door and an unbarred stairway leading up to it, and a hand, warm and tender, outstretched to receive him. Fear, hesitancy, awe, speechlessness before such a throne? Impossible. The meanest, humblest subject in all God's universe may approach it in boldness.

Ask "In My Name"

A second reason for boldness is enwrapped in that word "therefore"—the person and character of Him whom the suppliant beholds upon the throne. And who is it? We would expect to find God the Father holding the throne. But no, it is Christ the Son whom Paul shows us sitting in that seat. Our dealings are immediately with him. Was not this the picture which Jesus himself gave us? "If ye will ask anything in my name, I will do," was his promise. In these words he seems to claim absolute, if not exclusive, right to the place. It is as if he had said: "My father holds the throne of the world's control, but the throne of prayer is mine alone."

And in what guise is Jesus here presented? Not in regal guise, as we would expect. Strange as it seems, it is not as a king he holds this throne. Not as a conqueror, who exercises the power which a great triumph has accorded him. No, it is as a high-priest that he sits there. "Seeing, then, that we have a great high-priest which is gone into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession." Don't fail to get that. We make much of Christ as a Prophet these days—the Declarer of God's Will, the Teacher of Truth; also as a King who has won the throne of the world's admiration and acclaim, and is worthy of loyal obedience and submission; but Jesus the Priest is less familiar to us. If he is not a Priest when you are before the throne, you are without the true vision of him. True prayer, effectual prayer, is impossible without a recognition and realization of Christ's priesthood. He is there as a representative.

Our Kinsman and Brother

God's Representative, first of all. It is the Father's throne, but he has given it to his Son. In what body sits he there? Is it not the body of a man? And out of what kind of a past has he come to this throne? Back of him as he sits there is an earthly, human career of struggle and suffering, which has given him knowledge of man, interest in man, and sympathy for man. In the memory of that experience he is administering the throne of grace.

For the same reason he is also our Representative, who can understand our woes, our yearnings, our problems, our hungerings and thirstings of soul. He once mingled with men, nay, he himself has had a man's experience. And, therefore, the side of his priesthood which the author would have us see and appreciate is not the sacrificial but the sympathetic side; not his right to hear us and plead for us because of his death on the cross, but his ability, his capability as a Prayer-Hearer and Answerer. And so, instead of showing us a picture of a High-Priest standing by the altar of heaven, he represents the High-Priest as sitting upon its throne. Sometimes the picture is drawn of the throne with the cross just back of it, sometimes with the shadow of the cross falling upon it; but it speaks the truth far more precisely and eloquently to present that throne to us with Jesus sitting upon it, clad not in royal purple nor the white toga of sinlessness, but in the scarlet garb of the High-Priest, not now offering sacrifice at an altar, but dealing out favors from a throne. If, then, the friendly hearing, the gracious welcome we find at the throne emboldens us, how much more bold may we become when we recognize in him who sits upon that throne a Representative? No, better than that—a Friend; no, better still, a Kinsman and Brother.

Oh, praying men and women! for once get it clearly before your mind and heart that the hand into which you place your petitions is the hand that pushed the plane in the Nazareth carpenter shop, and was laid in healing and helping upon the sons and daughters of our humanity, as well as the hand that had the spikes driven through it, and the dearest, most alluring, most reassuring place in all the world will be the throne of grace. How clearly Horatio Bonar got the apostle's vision! Among all the hymns of the church few paint a finer or truer picture than this product of his pen:

> I see a Man at God's right hand,
> Upon the throne of God,
> And there the sevenfold light I see,
> The sevenfold sprinkled blood.
> I look upon that glorious Man,
> On that blood-sprinkled throne;
> I know that he sits there for me;
> That glory is my own.
> The heart of God flows forth in love,
> A deep eternal stream;
> Through that beloved Son it flows
> To me as unto him.
> And, looking on his face, I know—
> Weak, worthless, though I be—
> How deep, how measureless, how sweet
> That love of God to me.

To be in favor at the court of heaven and to have a Kinsman upon the throne, one might think the acme of good fortune. But our author has enfolded still another reason for boldness in that word, "therefore." It is what that throne has to give to those who pray. Two boons are held out to us, and it is easy to see how they include and embody every blessing we may come seeking. They are mercy and grace. Mercy, ordinarily, means compassion, and grace, favor; but both words have higher meanings here. Spiritual help, discriminating, gracious, spiritual help, is their synonym. Of the two, grace is the bigger word. Unfortunately, the church uses it less than formerly. Grace is the seed that grows the graces. It is heaven's dynamic operating on the earth. It is adapted omnipotence. It is applied divine energy. It is God's life transmitted to the believer. This is what we have handed out to us when we come to the throne. The author has given two or three touches here that light up the whole canvass with singularly striking effect.

Abundance for All Who Ask

1. This grace is "grace to help." Weak and empty-handed men and women, ready to faint, overwhelmed with unworthiness, burdened with need, here is immeasurable, sufficient, discriminating, adapted succor, and all to be had for the asking. Health, wisdom, comfort, holiness, peace, power, life—all conceivable good. No human need that cannot be instantly supplied and adequately supplied. Can a man realize that back of Him who sitteth upon the throne are the inexhaustible treasures of heaven, and be afraid to ask for the thing he needs?

2. It is adaptable grace. This is expressed by the idiom, "in time of need." That means something specific, personal, definite; no misfits, no mistakes, no misapprehensions at the throne. Never in all the ages—think of it!—has Jesus made a mistake in diagnosis or prescription. Can you conceive of the countless number of requests that come up to his throne from all over the universe? Think of the thousands crying to him this moment! The throne is like a great telephone exchange into which millions of calls come, and where each is answered without a single mistake. Only believe this, brother man, and this great exchange would not, as now, be seldom used.

3. Succoring grace, adapted grace, yes, and timely grace. That, too, is meant by the phrase, "in time of need," implying as it does promptness as well as adaptability. The tardiness of human help, as we have all had proved to us, is often its worst defect. The antidote must act promptly or death ensues. The engine must heed the first call or the fire gets beyond control. The brakes must instantly work or the train is wrecked.

Boldness in Prayer

And there are times when undue haste is as fateful as undue delay. If the trip-hammer strikes before the iron is in place, the anvil may be demolished. If the train is ahead of time, a collision is even more likely than if it is overdue. Previousness and procrastination are neither of them characteristics of the throne of grace. The help needed is given just at the right time, no later, no sooner.

Beloved, stand where this therefore brings these lines together to a focus, and see if you do not feel its force. Can you consider what the throne is, Who is on it, and what it has for you, and neglect it as you so often do; or will you doubt that your prayer will get a prompt and kindly hearing and bring a wise and succoring answer? Frame this picture, and hang it in the prayer chamber of your soul, and your approaches to the throne, your requests before the throne, and your expectations from the throne will be marked with ever-increasing and never-wearying boldness.

A VALUABLE COMPENDIUM

If not too late, allow me to congratulate you upon the production of your 1912 Almanac. I consider it a veritable concise compendium of valuable facts and figures. Your premiums are certainly unique, and deserve a place in every home in our country. I wish you and your staff unprecedented success in all your undertakings. I trust THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may double its circulation during the present year.

A SEA CHANGE

ALL yesterday blue heaven's dome
Smiled blessings on a sun-bathed sea,
Whose filmy caps of silver foam
Spoke more of mirth than majesty.

But Mother Nature, 'tween the suns,
Her subtle alchemy made plain;
Changed laughing blues to sullen duns,
And loosed the flood-gates of the rain.

And now the gale, in boisterous strength,
Lashes the swollen tide along,
Re-echoing down the sand's drenched length
The savage surges' ceaseless song.

The sad world veils itself in grays
Nun-like, and mourning in its lot—
Yet dreams of all the coming days
Of peace enjoyed and storms forgot!

WARWICK JAMES PRICE.

How Shall We Live?

WHEN Thoreau was asked, during his last illness, if he had made his peace with God, he replied that he had never quarreled with him. To the youth who thinks that he must sow his "wild oats," the steadfastness and nobleness of such a life does not appeal. Yet, sooner or later, he also must realize that the man who has always been at peace with God, because his life is lived in harmony with God's will, is the man who has got the most out of life.

"Experience" frequently means a learning not to do again something which ought not to have been done in the first place. And so experience is often a hard teacher. In many cases, the lesson is learned slowly and late. Why not seek wisdom from kinder instructors?

Ruskin's words concerning evil choice are worth remembering; in fact, one can hardly forget them, if he has once read them, for they strike deep.

"Nevermore to all eternity can you be as you might have been if you had not done that—chosen that. You have 'formed your character,' forsooth! No, if you have chosen ill, you have Deformed it, and that for ever! 'You will know better next time!' No. Next time will never come. Next time the choice will be in quite another aspect—between quite different things—you, weaker than you were by the evil into which you have fallen; it, more doubtful than it was, by the increased dimness of your sight."

"But shall I not know the world best by trying the wrong of it, and repenting?" a wayward youth exclaims. "Have I not, even as it is, learned much by many of my errors?" "Indeed," says Ruskin, "the effort by which partially you recovered yourself was precious; that part of your thought by which you discerned the error was precious. What wisdom and strength you kept and rightly used are rewarded; and in the pain and the repentance, and in the acquaintance with the aspects of folly and sin, you have learned something; how much less than you would have learned in right paths can never be told, but that it is less is certain. It is true, you know the habits of swine and the taste of husks; do you think your father could not have taught you to know better habits and pleasanter tastes, if you had stayed in his house?"

Education means development. Whatever stunts or deforms character is not development. Young people talk of "freedom" and their "rights." They have a right to become all it is possible that they should become, and there is no freedom for the evil doer. In Pilgrim's Progress, Christian and Hopeful found that By-path Meadow led to Doubting Castle, in which was a giant who beat them and deprived them of all freedom.

How sad it is for a person to waste his life in folly and sin, and then to repent just before he leaves the world! How much grander to be able to say, as Thoreau did, "I have never quarreled with God!" Such a man needs no epitaph on his tombstone. He still lives in the hearts of those whom he has inspired and helped. His has been a fruitful life. No time has been wasted.

A. M. G.

OUT OF THE DEPTHS

ALL thy waves and thy billows are gone over me."

What can be said to the wives and children of the brave men who went down to death? What can be said to the wider circle of friends, what can be said to the world that has lost some of its truest and most needed citizens? There lies the giant ship at the bottom of the sea. Its steel, its gilt and glass, its color, its charm, its spaciousness, its glory—all are at an end. And straggling among the rocks and weeds, or huddled with the ruined ship, are the bodies of more than a thousand men, brave men whom the world loved and needed.

Out of the depths we look up into God's face. Can we glimpse a light there? Can we catch a whisper that will steady our faith even when the mightiest of our ships and the bravest of our men go down? Can we find comfort for the heartbreak, hope through the shadow? What does it all mean?

IT MEANS, in the first place, that the biggest and the finest that man can do is, after all, a very tiny thing. "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand, and meted out heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure, and weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance?" Who else but God! "Behold, the nations are as a drop of a bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the balance; behold, he taketh up the isles as a very little thing."

It is a terrible price to pay for making the mind of the world look up to God, if that were the reason for the horror, or any part of the reason. But the price has been paid. It must not be in vain. It cannot be in vain. It is as impossible not to think of God in a time like this as not to think of the thunder when it crashes. There is no other goal for our thoughts and our cries. Doubting or trusting, soothed or sullen, we gather round his feet and look up to his face. And we know again that he is incomparably, transcendently, infinitely great. The ship was a little thing to the relentless, silent ice floe; both were little things to the wide-spreading sea. And all our ships and seas and worlds are little when we think of God.

IT IS not necessary, it is probably not true, to say that God caused the disaster. It seems to have been caused by the inexcusable neglect of men, neglect to provide life-boats for all, carelessness in plunging through the path of the icebergs instead of taking the lower highway through the freer sea. But even if the disaster were altogether the work of men, in which neither nature nor God should be asked to share any blame, yet our shocked souls realize sharply again how small and valueless are the things for which we strive and cry. How suddenly this wealth and power and beauty perished! We remember now, even if we had been forgetting, that there is business that brings eternal profit; there is pleasure that shall last forever; there is a life no tide nor depths can bring to an end. They are the life and the pleasure and the business to which the eternal God is ever wooing us.

THEN, too, although death is terrible, it is, after all, not most terrible. Does that sound cruel at a time like this, when we are thinking that nothing could be more fearful than the death they met? Yet they were, in essence, martyrs. We can see them now, stepping back and standing straight, as we know they did, Butt and Stead and Roebling and the rest, not seeking safety, not willing to accept it, that the women and the children might be spared. That weeping wife knows in the depths of her heart that she would rather her husband lay dead at the bottom of the sea than that he had selfishly fought for a place in one of the life-boats. So we see that in this very horror we can think of things worse than death. There are many worse things. And considering pain as a thing that can be weighed and measured, who shall say that the agony of a few terrible minutes or even hours facing death at sea is greater than the sum of all the pain awaiting through the years ahead? We can hear them saying, one by one:

No! Let me taste the whole of it, fare like my peers,
The heroes of old,
Bear the brunt, in a minute pay, glad, life's arrears
Of pain, darkness and cold.

Their bodies are at rest now. And a grave in the sea—is it so much sadder than a grave in the ground?

NEITHER they nor we are yet outside God's care. He is great, but he is also gentle. Can we sing it now, even while our thoughts of the sea are so sad,

There's a wideness in God's mercy,
Like the wideness of the sea.

There surely is. We shall never know what confident words of trust were spoken aloud; we shall never know how those who felt the comfort and peace of God urged those who doubted to rest their souls in him; we shall never know what prayers were uttered nor—for there must have been some song—what hymns were sung. But we know that the love of God was there, bringing light and hope in the desperate hour. The great ship was swallowed up in the sea; and for those who looked to Christ death was swallowed up in victory.

THE sea of life, a vastly greater sea, stretches out again before us all. Let us test our compasses and scan our charts and search for the unfailing signals. Even for the hearts flooded with grief now there may be a prosperous, yes, even a happy voyage. Love abides, hope abides, God abides. And whether the last call comes suddenly for us, as it came for them, or after due warning, we may sail on to the harbor unafraid. God's Son knows perfectly the sea we traverse; he has passed through its storms, its woe, and triumphed over the worst that it can do. No matter how fierce the storm he has not lost his power to bring peace. He voyages with us now, and shall await us, radiant, at the journey's end. Let these words of a rugged sailor sing themselves in your heart at every time of stress, and when the voyage draws to its close:

For though from out the bourne of Time and Place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crossed the bar.

MASTER AND MAN

SIDE by side through the wilderness,
And over the rocky road,
The Master walks with his servants here,
To lighten their heavy load.

Never a path too hard for him,
And never a day too long
To cheer their hearts with his tender smile,
And gladden their souls with song.

He trod the way before for them,
And measured each weary mile,
He knows just what is in store for them
As he bids them rest awhile.

The tired feet are a care to him,
And the fears and the troubled heart,
With the griefs they daily bear to him
From fireside, field and mart.

So side by side through the wilderness,
And over the rocky road,
The Master walks with his servants here
To lighten their heavy load.

Tent Evangel Banquet

THE thirty-third season of the work of the Old Tent Evangel Committee of New York, was inaugurated on April 9, 1912, by a banquet given at the Park Avenue Hotel by Mr. George M. Gillespie to one hundred guests, among whom were some of the most influential citizens of the metropolis. The most striking event of the evening was a series of old-fashioned mission testimonies given by a number of men who have been saved in the mission established at 974 Eighth Avenue as the result of the summer campaigns of the committee. Superintendent Rev. G. W. McPherson outlined the plans of the work for the coming season, and addresses were made by Rev. H. M. Wharton, D.D., of Brantley Memorial Church, Baltimore; Rev. J. Lewis Hartsock, D.D., pastor Union M. E. Church, New York; Rev. Curtis Lee Laws, D.D., pastor Green Avenue Baptist Church, Brooklyn; Rev. W. G. McCready, D.D., rector of St. Peter's Episcopal Church, Brooklyn; Rev. William Carter, D.D., pastor Madison Avenue Reformed Church, New York; Rev. John Allen, D.D., associate pastor Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York; Rev. Leonard T. Requa, Jr., Rutherford, N. J.; Mr. E. M. Whittemore, New York; and Mr. A. H. Howland, an associate editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Prominent evangelists and clergymen have been engaged for the coming season and there is every prospect of a victorious campaign.

The Nursery

(See cover)

THE painting from which the cover of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been reproduced is one of a long series of country scenes and landscapes that has earned for its painter, Ernest Albert Waterlow, a membership in the Royal Academy, the presidency of the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colors and a knighthood at the hands of the late King Edward of Great Britain. The picture tells its own story. Few of us have missed seeing at some time a scene very similar to this, which has charmed the famous artist. Aside from the interesting story it suggests of the care of the kindly farm woman for the babies of the flock, it fairly sings of those glorious days when all the earth is new clothed in green and decked with all the first blossoms of the year.

THE OPPOSITION MAN

BY J. J. BELL

Author of "Wee Macgreegor," "Mr. Lion of London," "Clyde Songs," etc.

WHEN the door had closed on the bringer of ill-tidings, Mr. Redhorn, the painter, re-seated himself at the table, smoothed his few remaining hairs with an unsteady palm, sighed, and turned to his apprentice, whom he happened to be entertaining to tea.

"Proceed wi' your eatin', laddie," he said kindly. "Tak' plenty jam. When ye're young ye maun pey attention to yer inside, whatever happens. As for me, I doot it's a dooble dose o' the Dyspeepsia Elixir I'm requirin.' "

"I wish Danks was deid!" the boy cried hotly. "I wish he was—"

"Na, na; ye mauna wish that aboot onybody, Wullie. We was bound to hear the bad news sooner or later—"

"But it was the wey he tell't ye—"

"Ay, ay"—Mr. Redhorn produced a cigarette from a paper bag—"it was the wey he tell't me. I confess to bilin' inwardly masel', Wullie, though I trust I didna betray ma feelin's. But, ye see, Danks has never got ower his spite at me for no takin' his nephew for ma apprentice instead o' yersel'. Moreover, he was aye cauld-heartit like the fish he sells. Oh, ay, he was rale delighted to be the bearer o' the bad news. It's a curious thing," the painter continued reflectively, "hoo humanity delights in inhumanity on what I micht ca' a sma' scale. It doesna rejoice in a railway accident, but it likes fine to behold a man tummle on a slide; it doesna cry 'hurray' when a man breaks, but, apparently, it canna help giein' a bit snicker when it sees a neighbor lossin' money. An' it hasna aye the excuse Danks has for rejoicin' at ma misfortune."

"What excuse has Danks, Maister Ridhorn?" inquired Willie, still flushed, but reaching for the jam-pot.

"I've just been tellin' ye." The bachelor here coughed violently and wiped his faded blue eyes. "I wish I had never startit the smokin', Wullie," he resumed, "but I was tell't it was soothin' to the nerves. Strikes me I best try it for the chilblains." He took a timid puff or two. "Nevertheless, Danks is a cruel enemy. If I was a blackamoor that believed in the transmiguration o' the souls, I wud say Danks was oreeginally a finnan haddie. But there's nae use talkin' aboot it, Wullie. We'll just hae to try an' bear it."

"Ay," said Willie, bolting a large bite, mainly of jam, "but what are ye gaun to dae aboot the opposeetion when it comes?"

"Ye've a practical mind, ma lad! Whiles I doot mine's becomin' ower pheelosophical. Yer question is to the point, though it's maybe a wee thing previous. What wud you advise me to dae aboot the opposeetion—when it comes?"

"Burst it," was the prompt reply.

"That wud be exceedin' excellent advice if the opposeetion was appearin' in the shape of a balloon, but as it happens to assume the form o' a human bein' conseederably younger nor masel' an', accordin' to Danks, supplied wi' plenty o' capital, I canna but feel that ye spoke hasty—"

"I meant that ye could keep on daein' jobs chaper nor the opposeetion man till ye burst him," said Willie.

Mr. Redhorn shook his head. "It's a guid thing ye're gaun to be a penter, Wullie, or ye micht live to be what they ca' a high financier. But I may tell ye I've been the sole penter, paper-hanger an' decorator in Fairport for upwards o' thirty year, an'—weel, I haena made a fortune. An' though ye're but an apprentice in the first blush o' youth, as the novels say, ye ken as weel as I dae that there's no enough business in Fairport to keep twa penters."

"Maybe the falk'll no gang to the opposeetion man," said Willie. "It's likely they'll stick to you."

The painter sighed. "When ye're as auld as me ye'll ken mair aboot the flightiness o' the public. Changes are lichtsome. The new shop aye gets custom—maybe no enough to mak' it prosper, but suffeecient to hurt the auld shop, if no to ruin it completely."

"But ye'll no let the opposeetion man burst ye?" the boy exclaimed. "I meant for to say—"

"That'll dae, Wullie, that'll dae. I'm no in the habit o' meetin' trouble hauf-roads—unless the trouble happens to be dyspeepsia." With which remark Mr. Redhorn rose, and taking a bottle of cough medicine from the mantelpiece, removed the cork and helped himself to a mouthful. "Ay," he went on, with sundry grimaces, "we'll see what the public o' Fairport is made o'."

"But what'll ye dae when ye see the opposeetion man?" persisted the apprentice.

"'What kin' o' paper wud ye pit on for a man wi' a rid nose?' inquired Willie"

"An' what wud you hae me dae?" the painter asked a little impatiently. "Pit oot ma tongue at him?"

"I'll dae that if ye like, Maister Ridhorn; but I wud suner hand him a bat on the nose an' knock him ower the pierheid an'—"

"Wullie," said Mr. Redhorn impressively, "politeness costs naething—in cash, at ony rate. When the man starts business here the eye o' Fairport'll be on you an' me as well as on him. Mind that! Be dignified, be discreet. Conceal yer feelin's o' righteous indignation. Pey attention to yer job, whatever it happens to be, as if naething extraor'nar' was occurrin'. In ither words, let Fairport see that we dinna care a fig. Help yersel' to jam, laddie—for a' the opposeetion in the world!"

Presently Willie, having finished his repast, remarked: "They say Maister Hood up the hill is for gettin' his hoose pentit sune. Ye should hurry up and get the order afore—"

"I think we'll leave Maister Hood to the opposeetion," Mr. Redhorn interrupted with a faint smile.

"What wey that?"

"Weel, ye see, Wullie, Maister Hood, as ye may learn frae ma ledger, which is a record o' disapp'intments, tak's frae twa an' a hauf to three years' credit. Efter a', there's a few customers I wudna grudge to the opposeetion."

"'Deed, ye're fly!"

"I wud prefer ye to use the word 'discreet,' ma lad. Noo ye best rin hame an' see if ye canna dae onything to help yer mither. See an' be at yer wark prompt to time in the mornin', an' no' gie Fairport any excuse for complaints."

"But ye're no feart for the opposeetion, are ye?" said Willie, taking up his cap.

"Dae I look feart?" demanded the painter.

"N—na," Willie replied, from the door. "Na exac'ly feart. Maybe it's yer dyspeepsia. I hope it'll sune be better. Guidnicht, Maister Ridhorn."

"Guidnicht, laddie." Mr. Redhorn stroked his long nose in a reflective fashion. "Am I feart?" he muttered. "Or is't jist ma face?"

II

THE Opposition Man had made his preliminary visits to Fairport incog.; he had spied the land, as it were, without proclaiming his intentions to any of the inhabitants, whom, as a matter of fact, he misled by certain actions into taking him for an inspector of telegraph poles. It was not until he had rented a cottage on the shore and instructed the local joiner to erect a wooden workshop that the truth so disturbing to Mr. Redhorn, so gratifying to Mr. Danks, was made known. Mr. Redhorn, being the sort of man who does not become popular until death has covered a few little weaknesses and uncovered many good deeds, was not an object for the united sympathy of the villagers and owners of villas in the vicinity. People began to remember his failings, his sins of omission and commission. Some expressed the opinion that the opposition would serve him right, others the pious hope that it might improve the quality of his workmanship and materials.

"It'll maybe learn him to feenish his jobs when he says he'll feenish them," said old Miss McPhun, who for seven years had been disputing the correctness of an account for painting a hen-house.

"Ay," said her neighbor, Mrs. Dory, whose husband had once been offended by Mr. Redhorn's refusal to accept cabbages instead of cash for the varnishing of a punt, "I was hearin' that the opposeetion man is frae the toon, so he'll be smart an' up-to-date, as they say. Ridhorn'll hae to look slippy, I'm thinkin', if he doesna want to loss custom."

The village was full of rumors. The new man was "backed" by a powerful firm in the city; he was determined to capture the painting trade of Fairport; already he had secured the contract for painting the pier; sooner or later he would buy out Joseph Redhorn. As for Redhorn, he was thinking of retiring; he would retire at the end of the year; he had decided to retire forthwith; he had declared his intention of fighting to his last penny. And so on. Willie reported all he heard to his master, who looked angry or miserable or impatient, but for the most part held his tongue. The opposition was casting its shadow before. Already Mr. Redhorn was being disappointed in several old customers on whose patronage he reckoned at that time of the year. It was plain to him that those people were waiting to see what the new painter was like.

On the first of March the local postman delivered to most of the inhabitants of Fairport envelopes bearing half-penny stamps and a city postmark. The envelopes contained squares of glossy pink paper, printed, in seven styles of type, as follows:

P. Smith
Respectfully begs to intimate to
The Residents in Fairport
And the Surrounding District
That he is commencing Business as Painter, Paper-hanger and Decorator and trusts
To be favored with their esteemed Commands.
P. Smith's
Motto is:
Punctuality, Promptitude and Perfection.

Willie's mother having received a copy, the boy took it along to his master, who chanced to be painting a summer-house. After a prolonged inspection Mr. Redhorn carefully folded and returned it.

"Wullie," he said slowly, "I've nae fault to find wi' the language o' Maister P. Smith, an' his motto is unreproachable. But the man that sends oot a circular on paper like that has nae mair artistic feelin's nor a—plumber."

"I thocht it was a pretty color, Maister Ridhorn."

"Ay; it's vera suitable for a sweetie-poke or a love letter. But ye're young yet, laddie. I'm no blamin' ye. I've made blunders in ma time. I mind when I papered a parlor a vera pale yella for a gent wi' a rid nose—"

"But what kin' o' paper wud ye pit on for a man wi' a rid nose?" inquired Willie, with genuine interest.

"A rich crimson wi' a decided pattern," replied Mr. Redhorn gravely. "Aye try to study yer customers—when ye get them. In the meantime pey attention to yer pentin.' "

Two days later, on a wet and windy afternoon, arrived Mr. P. Smith, a youngish man with a neat moustache, alert eyes and a jaunty step. His progress from the pier was witnessed by the bulk of Fairport's population. Mr. Redhorn, however, remained in his workshop, pretending to mix a supply of paint which he had no immediate occasion to use.

To him came the apprentice, panting.

"I seen him, Maister Ridhorn, I seen him!"

"Seen wha?"

"The opposeetion. He's jist come aff the boat!"

"Did ye expec' him to come aff an airyplane?"

Willie looked hurt. "I ran to tell ye as hard as I could," he protested.

"Thenk ye, laddie." Mr. Redhorn's expression lost some of its stiffness. "Thenk ye; but I'm no deeply interested in the advent o' P. Smith, Esquire, penter, paperhanger, an' decorator."

"I thocht ye was."

"Did ye?"

Willie glanced at his master and then went over to the bench at the far end of the shop, where he began playing with a lump of putty.

At the end of a three minutes' silence Mr. Redhorn, in a voice strange to his apprentice, said:

"Wullie, mark ma words, I'm no gaun to lie doon to ony man in the pentin' tred. An' in the language o' yersel' I'm gaun to burst P. Smith inside o' a couple o' years!"

"My!" exclaimed Willie, and kept his mouth open as if expecting further sensational revelations.

"What's the man like?" said Mr. Redhorn coldly.

"I didna see him extra weel. He was carryin' a baby."

"A baby!"

"Ay. So was his wife."

"His wife!"

"Ay. Did ye no hear he had a wife an' five weans, Maister Ridhorn?"

"Five weans!"

"Maybe it's six."

Mr. Redhorn let go the stick with which he had been stirring the paint. He smoothed his few remaining hairs; he stroked his long nose. "Five weans!" he murmured.

"Peter Shaw said he coonted six."

Mr. Redhorn did not seem to hear. After a longish silence he said—

"Wullie, there's naething daein' the day, so ye best awa' an' amuse yersel'."

"Wud ye no like me to gang an' see hoo the opposeetion's gettin' on? His furniture's got soakit wi' the rain, an' I heard three of his weans was seeck on the boat."

Mr. Redhorn looked at his apprentice. "Jist you gang hame an' tell that to yer mither, an' see what she says," he said gently. "Awa' wi' ye."

When Willie had gone he resumed stirring the paint.

"Five weans!" he murmured. "Gad, that's a handicap—to Joseph Ridhorn!"

III

FEW things evaporate so quickly as the public's interest in an individual; few so slowly as the individual's interest in the public. For a week or so Fairport wondered about P. Smith. (His Christian name has not come to light; he never mentioned or wrote it, and his wife, a woman with a patient mouth and anxious eyes, invariably addressed or referred to him as Father.) After a week or so P. Smith began to wonder about Fairport. It was as though he had taken a high dive before a crowd and had risen, gasping, only to ask himself where all the people had gone, and, later, to doubt if any one had really cared whether he sank or swam.

At the same time P. Smith made friends in Fairport. He was a pleasant fellow and avoided exhibiting his city ways and wit at the expense of his more sluggish-minded neighbors. Though he could not play bowls he became a member of the club, of which Mr. Danks, the fishmonger, was president. Possessed of a fair voice, he joined the church choir. He was first to put his hand in his pocket when a collection was taken for the widow Waldie.

And so far as work was concerned, he made a fair start. He was commissioned by the fishmonger to paint his shop inside and out, and he obtained the pier contract. It is true that after the former job was finished, Mr. Danks proposed settling the bill with a year's supply of fish, and, that being gratefully but firmly refused, withheld payment in cash until the creditor was fain to submit to a deduction of ten per cent. by way of discount. Then the second job must have resulted, according to Mr. Redhorn's calculations, in a net loss of £7 15s.

It must not be imagined, however, that these things gave Mr. Redhorn any great satisfaction or prevented him from treating his opponent in courteous if chilly fashion.

"I seen ye speakin' to Smith again the day," said Willie one evening in May. "Did ye no hear he had gotten the job at the Manse?"

Said Mr. Redhorn: "He's welcome to that job. As for speakin' to the man, did ye never hear o' gladiators salutin' each ither afore commencin' to stab each ither in the vittles? As I've already informed ye, politeness costs naething. P. Smith kens as weel as I dae that it's war to the knife—"

"My! Wud ye stab the man, Maister Ridhorn?"

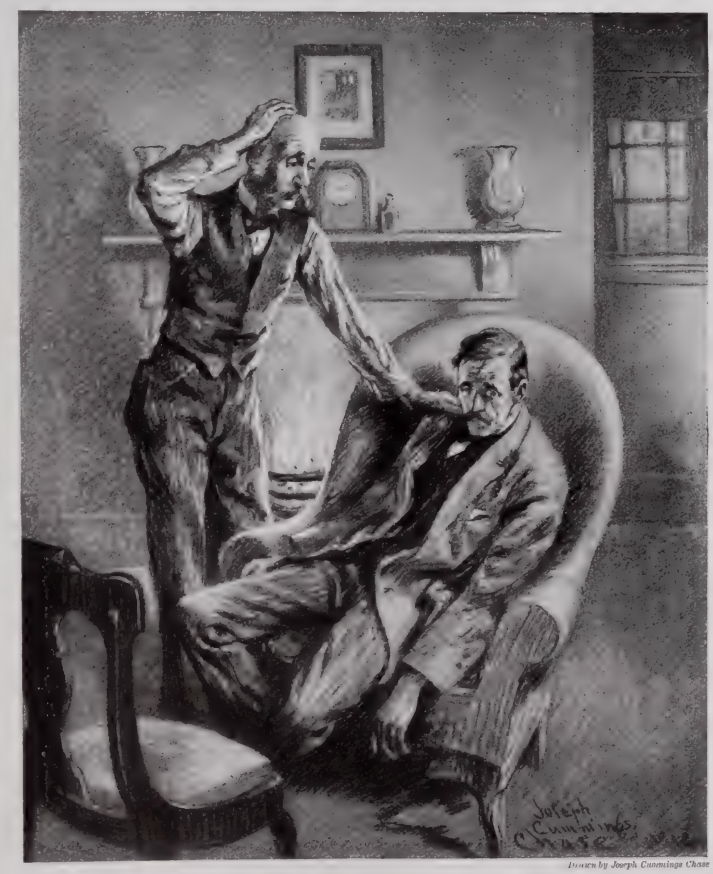
"Metaphorically speakin'," said Mr. Redhorn, "I wud! But as lang as he salutes me, I'll salute him."

"Aw," said Willie, disappointedly. "There's awfu' little tred for us the noo," he added.

"Ye're gettin' yer wages a' the same," Mr. Redhorn returned dryly.

"D'ye think ye'll manage to burst him in twa years?"

"Less nor that," replied the painter, in a boastful tone that was new to the boy. "Gi'e me a twelvemonth, ma lad."



Drawn by Joseph Cummings Chase

"'See here, Smith; what are ye gaun to dae?'"

"My! But ye're a corker!" cried Willie, involuntarily. "I mean ye're rale savage—brave, I mean."

"Wullie, I'm gaun to confide in ye. I've swallowed an insult, an' it hasna agreed wi' me. In the course o' wur conversation the day P. Smith informed me that he had been through the Manse, inspectin' it afore concoctin' his estimate. The word 'concoctin' is mine. He likewise informed me that it appeared to be mony years since the Manse was last pentit an' papered, an' that, in his opeenion, the man that done the job maun ha'e had the notions an' taste o' a hippopotamus sufferin' frae hydrophobia—"

Willie laughed, and stopped short.

"The man that done it," said Mr. Redhorn hoarsely, "was me."

"Did ye tell him? I wonder ye didna hand him a bat on—"

"I—I preferred that he should learn the truth frae some ither party. But, as aforesaid, the insult has disagreed wi' me."

"Like the tinned sawmon ye had last week?"

"That's enough!" said the painter sternly.

After a pause the boy asked, "Dae ye want me to tell him aboot the Manse, Maister Ridhorn?"

"In the meantime I prefer him to conteenue in his meeserable eegnorance, laddie. Let the truth confound him in due season. I may say that he referred to ma oreeginal stencil o' conventional comets on the staircase as deleerious sassiges—"

"I doubt he kent it was you a' the time, an' was takin' a rise oot o' ye."

"A rise oot o' me!" Mr. Redhorn sat down in his ancient easy-chair.

"I've a guid mind to heave a brick through his window the nicht," said Willie, sympathizingly.

"Na, na. Nae violence," said Mr. Redhorn. "Ye best awa' hame," he said presently in an almost natural voice. "Divulge naething o' what ye've heard here. But—gi'e me a twelvemonth frae this date!"

Left to himself he took up a penny novelette and endeavored to become absorbed in its villainies and virtues. But as he read he muttered: "Hippopotamus—hydrophobia—deleerious sassiges!"

Verily there were worse afflictions than the loss of money.

IV

UPON what precisely Joseph Redhorn based his estimate of his opponent's financial staying power will probably never be known. Perhaps he gained a hint from the man's manner, which to his shrewd enough intelligence seemed artificially buoyant; perhaps he guessed something from the face of the man's wife. Or it may have been only bluff when he spoke of a twelvemonth to his apprentice. The fact remains that his estimate turned out to be correct. Indeed, if anything, it had erred on the safe side. As Mr. Redhorn had said, there was not sufficient work in Fairport for two painters, and that particular year brought even fewer orders than usual. Then in the autumn Mrs. P. Smith had a baby, and in the winter three of her children took measles. Just before the new year P. Smith's paint store went on fire, and the damage, though only "partial," was not covered by insurance. P. Smith was seen less in the choir and more in the beer-shop. He avoided his opponent in trade. But his manner was more buoyant than ever. He talked briskly, almost feverishly, of the orders he was going to secure for the approaching spring.

On a snowy night in February Mr. Redhorn, seated at his hearth, was turning over the pages of his ledger, and looking an object of unutterable melancholy, when Willie arrived with a parcel of freshly baked scones from his mother. The painter, after expressing his thanks in a somewhat confused fashion, invited the boy to sit down and partake of a bottle of lemonade. It was soon apparent that Willie had news.

"Maister Ridhorn," he said, "d'ye ken what they're sayin' ootbye?"

"They're sayin' it's bitter cauld, I suppose. The frigidity o' ma feet has never been surpassed."

"They're sayin' that P. Smith hasna bocht any butcher meat for a month, an' they're sayin' that Danks the fishmonger is gaun to summons him to the court for his fish account. I seen him gaun into the beershop as I cam' by."

Mr. Redhorn, having set the boy's refreshment on the table, sat down slowly.

"Aw!" he muttered.

"An' they're sayin' there was a man here frae

Heroic Souls

NOTHING can dim the luster of those brave men who gave up their lives for others before the Titanic took her plunge beneath the waves. There was the "true gold" of heroism, refined by the furnace of trial. Disdaining to seek their own safety, they made sure that the weak and the helpless were under care in the lifeboats. Then, smiling at fate, they waited the end with folded arms, calm and confident. Such men were Jacques Futrelle, who, being tempted to save himself (as some craven souls did), bowed and said "Not while one woman remains on board," and Henry B. Harris, who pushed his wife toward safety with a gentle "Good-by, dear; ladies first." Such men, too, were Major Archibald Butt, who, like a true soldier and gentleman, scorned to enter a boat, but stayed to see all the women and children embarked; and George B. Widener and John B. Thayer and Isidor Straus. All honor to those heroic souls who in their last hour exemplified the words of the Master: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

The Lesson of the Disaster

NOW that calm reflection has succeeded the shock of horror over the awful Titanic disaster, people are beginning to ask: "Where lies the responsibility for this frightful sacrifice of human life? Could it not have been averted?"

No outlay had been spared in the construction and adornment of this leviathan—the largest that ever floated on any sea. She had sumptuous saloons, splendidly fitted gymnasiums and swimming-pools, and every facility was provided for comfort and pleasure regardless of the cost; yet she lacked the one thing most vital, beside which all of her splendid furnishings were as worthless truck. She had life-boats sufficient to save only one-third of her passengers.

Here was the one terrible neglect of duty which resulted in the death of more than 1,500 human beings. Alexander Carlisle, who designed both the Titanic and her sister ship, the Olympic, said in London on April 16: "The Titanic and the Olympic were fitted with davits designed for and capable of carrying four times the number of boats actually fitted in the ships when they went to sea. Although a large margin was then left, I think I am correct in saying that the Titanic carried 5 per cent. over the number of boats required by the Board of Trade rules." This, of course, refers to the British Board of Trade, which is an institution evidently attaching more importance to the speed record of ocean-going vessels than to the safety of their passengers. Under United States laws it is expressly declared that every passenger ship must be provided with life-boats, floats, rafts and preservers sufficient to secure the safety of all on board.

Let us look at the figures with respect to the Titanic's actual provision for saving life. Her passenger capacity was 2,500, although on the fatal voyage she carried several hundred less than this number. Her crew numbered 900 men. She could easily have accommodated fifty life-boats on her davits (Mr. Carlisle said many more). A life-boat complement is ordinarily forty persons. The Titanic's twenty boats would be filled with 800, of whom something over 100 would be seamen from the crew, detailed to navigate the boats. Assuming, as the reports indicate, that this ocean giant carried in all some 2,200 human beings, crews included, she should have had at least fifty life-boats, representing assurance of safety for 2,000 passengers. Even with that apparently ample provision, she would still have been deficient five boats, for the excess of 200 persons.

Had the Titanic had her proper equipment of life-boats and rafts, every soul aboard could have been saved. The loss of the vessel and her cargo is merely a commercial item and is covered by insurance; but the sacrifice of human life through culpable neglect is without palliation or excuse. Captain Smith went down with his ship and his lips are forever sealed; but if it be true that before sailing on this ill-starred voyage, he asked for more boats for the Titanic and was refused, then the responsibility should be placed where it really belongs. The censorship that has veiled the disaster has naturally inclined the public to distrust. Now, the White Star Company must stand forth in the clear light of publicity, until everything connected with this greatest of ocean tragedies is fully known and explained. If the Titanic, her passengers and crew were victims of the selfish struggle now going on for the commercial supremacy of the sea, the whole world must know it. If danger and life and death are all to be made secondary to the speed record, and if a sufficiency of life-boats and other safeguards is looked upon as mere impedimenta, then the traveling public should know it—and they will govern themselves accordingly.

But the Titanic was not a solitary example of a liner setting out without an adequate complement of life-boats and life-rafts. Remember, under the United States laws, a passenger steamer must carry enough life-saving provision for every passenger. With this essential fact in mind, look at these figures, from the official records of the United States Government inspectors of ocean steamships. They are exclusive of preservers and buoys, a considerable number of which is carried by all liners:

Steamers	Crew	Passengers	Boats & Rafts	Capacity of Boats & Rafts
Adriatic	447	1,778	18	1,040
Baltic	370	2,041	22	1,002
Celtic	237	1,209	26	1,222
Bluecher	306	2,080	21	951
Carpathia	266	2,596	18	1,005
Kaiser Wilhelm II.	652	1,727	30	1,825
Mauretania	812	2,160	16	982
Oceanic	373	1,748	23	1,175
Olympic	923	2,524	20	1,171
President Grant	346	3,597	28	1,522
Grosse Kurfuerst	278	1,942	22	1,017
Lusitania	756	2,133	16	986
Pennsylvania	250	2,892	22	1,017
St. Louis	341	1,284	23	962
Kaiserin Aug. Victoria	596	2,782	35	2,026
Caledonia	230	1,373	19	930
Arcadian	282	618	15	628

From these figures it can be seen at a glance that only a few of the great liners which come to American ports have anything like a proper supply of boats. Perhaps the most notable exceptions are the German steamers, but some of these are short of the actual requirements under the American law.

It is always an easy thing to be wise after the event, to make haste to apply the obvious remedy, to lock the stable door after the horse has been stolen. Experience which shows how existing laws for protecting life are ignored is unfortunately only too abundant. Hundreds would have been saved had the owners of the Iroquois Theater in Chicago complied with the law providing for sufficient exits. If the excursion steamer General Slocum had only had an adequate supply of life preservers, at an outlay of a few hundred dollars, that sickening holocaust would have been averted. A few thousand dollars expended on the defective dam at Austin, Pa., as the engineers had urgently recommended, would have prevented the foundation "slide" which shattered the concrete, flooded the valley and drowned many of its people. If fire-escapes to the number required by law had been provided in the Asch Building, the horrible tragedy of the Triangle fire in New York, in which so many poor shirtwaist makers perished, would have been unaccompanied by loss of life. Neglect and evasion of the law by owners and others, selfish parsimony and cold-blooded indifference to the safety of those whose lives were entrusted to their keeping, were the prime causes of each of these disasters. The crisis comes suddenly, the nation is stunned with the wicked waste of human life, and then, after all the evil has been done and the helpless victims are past recall, we permit the guilty to escape, patch up a remedy of new and stronger laws and demand their rigid enforcement. We lock the stable door after the horse has been stolen.

Is this to be the outcome of the great ocean tragedy which has just robbed fifteen hundred human beings of life? Is the Titanic horror to be merely a nine days' wonder, quickly forgotten? The public memory is not tenacious, but we do not believe in its present state of feeling that it can be satisfied with less than a thorough investigation which shall bring the responsibility home to the guilty parties. Not only this, but ocean travel must be made safer hereafter. Steamship companies look out sharply for their own financial interests; let us now look out with equal zeal for the welfare of the traveling public. There should be an international agreement on better laws for the safety of ocean liners. The dangerous "northern lane," which the Titanic recklessly followed, should be forbidden to passenger steamers at certain seasons, in order to avoid the peril of icebergs. An ocean patrol should be established in the commercial highways of the Atlantic for affording the speediest means of communication and rescue. And finally, a speed limit should be definitely fixed. Too many gallant vessels, and far too many human lives, have been sacrificed to the mania for a speed record. It should be made impossible for any passenger vessel to leave an American port unless she is amply equipped with all the modern appliances for saving and protecting human life. Thus the awful sacrifice on the Titanic will have taught a practical lesson and the deep sorrow into which two continents are now plunged will be softened by the knowledge that their fate brought to fruition a great reform which makes the whole world their debtor. Then, cruel and terrible as was their taking off, the sacrifice will not have been in vain.

Relief for the Survivors

AMERICANS are quick to respond to the call of suffering. Within a few hours after the news of the Titanic disaster reached New York, offers of help began to pour in from every side. The mayor opened a relief fund, a committee of charitable ladies began a similar work and public and private hospitals tendered the use of wards and the services of physicians. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offered to place at the disposal of the White Star Company its beautiful Children's Home at Mont-Lawn with its complete equipment, where several hundred of the survivors could be temporarily accommodated until strength returned and they were able to proceed to their ultimate destination. Should this offer be accepted, many of the invalid women and children would find renewed health and vigor in the tonic air of the Children's Paradise. Many of the rescued lost all their little worldly possessions in the wreck. Mothers and little ones, bereft of husbands and fathers, are cast upon the world utterly helpless. What can be done for them by benevolent hearts should be done quickly. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will receive and acknowledge contributions for the sufferers, and every gift so sent will be applied exclusively to the relief of the mothers and children. Such spontaneous acts of kindness may help somewhat to soften their grief and lighten their burden of immediate cares. God alone can heal the wounded heart. We pray that he may comfort the fatherless and the widow in this time of deep affliction.

Clara Barton, World's Benefactor

CLARA BARTON, founder of the Red Cross, and one of the most remarkable American women of the present age, died at her home in Glen Echo, Md., on Friday, April 11, at the age of ninety. The remains were buried at Oxford, Mass., the home of her family. Her service in the sick-camps during the Civil War, the war in Cuba, at Johnstown, Pa., and Galveston, Texas, after the great floods, and also in Russia and Armenia gave her a world-wide reputation as a philanthropist. Miss Barton was born on a farm. She received a good education and began teaching school in Bordentown, N. J., when she was only sixteen. Her health breaking down under the strain, she went on a visit to Washington, and secured a clerkship in the Patent Office during President Buchanan's administration. In the early days of the Civil War a company of a Massachusetts regiment reached Washington from Baltimore, many of the men suffering from wounds. Miss Barton went out to meet them, and soon found that they were in need of kindly ministrations. She provided food and delicacies for them, and soon friends began to help her in this Samaritan work. Within a week she became the leader in a remarkable movement for sending comfort and cheer to the men at the front. But she was not long content to remain at her post. The news she heard convinced her that she had a mission to go to the army and do what lay in her power for the sick and wounded soldiers in the improvised hospitals. She went to the front, where she became known as the "Angel of Mercy" from her ministrations at Chickamauga, Fredericksburg, and other battlefields. This was the beginning of her real career. She went abroad and was present at the conference at Berne, Switzerland, when the International Red Cross was organized. She served as a ministering angel all through the Franco-Prussian War, and when she returned to this country, she organized the American Red Cross Society, which, under her skilful and sympathetic control, did excellent service in many cases of floods, explosions and similar disasters when there were large numbers of sufferers. During the reconcentrado suffering in Cuba, immediately before the outbreak of the Spanish-American War, President McKinley appointed three Americans as commissioners to arrange for succoring the starving thousands in the Cuban cities. Ex-Mayor Schieren of Brooklyn, Stephen Barton, and Dr. Louis Klopsch constituted this commission. Dr. Klopsch despatched Miss Barton to Havana to superintend the work of relief and gave her $10,000 to begin operations. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers contributed largely toward the relief fund. Dr. Klopsch himself went to Havana later and expedited the work, and soon relief trains were speeding across Cuba to various cities where they were most needed. Many thousands of lives were saved by this humanitarian work. The human sympathy Christ had, and the curing of the sick he wrought were imitated by this American Florence Nightingale.

And Jesus was moved with compassion toward them, and he healed their sick. (Matt. 14 : 14.)

A Fatal Temptation

FOUR boys started for Sunday School in Kearney, N. J. Two of them were brothers. The spring weather was so balmy that one suggested that instead of going to the Sunday School they take a row on the Passaic River. They went to the boat house and rented a boat for two hours. All wanted to row, and two on a seat with an oar each took turns. They did not understand handling the oars, and getting out into a treacherous tide and undertaking to go under the Erie Railroad bridge, the skiff capsized. One swam to the pier, two were dragged out more dead than alive, and were resuscitated, but one of the brothers was drowned. About the hour for the return of the brothers from the Sunday School session a cousin came to the house to notify the parents of the accident, but the father did not know his boy was dead till he got to the boat house. They had to hold him to keep him from jumping into the river, and the grief of the family was terrible. These boys were not the first who have been enticed from Sunday School or church by some form of amusement or another. The horse, the wheel, the motor car, the baseball game, the golf links, the week-end social entertainment and other things tempt the Christian to neglect the services of the Lord's house. It is hardly a surprise that the children should copy the older people in the widespread disregard of the Christian Sabbath and service. Christ's injunction is in good place now:

Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation. (Matt. 26 : 41.)

Gift of Cherry Trees

THE first of three thousand budding cherry trees, the gift token of Japanese residents of the city of New York, were set out the other day at Grant's tomb by Park Commissioner Stover. Tenderly, almost reverently, M. Enomota, the Japanese expert who superintended the planting, handled the first tree as he placed it in the earth, while all the Japanese stood with bared heads. This tree was one of the gyoi roi variety, the rarest of the cherry tree species. Of the two thousand trees presented the committee were able to get only thirty of these. The color of the blossom is light yellow, with greenish spots. The other trees bear blossoms of varying shades, from delicate pink to a deep red. The trees are not fruit-bearing, the cherries being small and bitter. The shoots set out were about four feet in height and about the diameter of a thin walking-stick. In Japan the trees reach a diameter of three feet when fully grown, and the average age is more than one hundred and fifty years. A tablet made in the Tokyo Art School, commemorating the gift of the cherry trees, will be placed in the park space east of the tomb. How beautiful, like the cherry blossoms, was the love in the hearts of the Japanese that prompted the gift—love for their home land and its national tree, and affection for the land of their adoption! The prophet thus refers to tree-planting as a memorial of divine care:

I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah tree, and the myrtle, and the oil tree; I will set in the desert the fir tree, and the pine, and the box tree together. (Isa. 41 : 19.)

SUSAN L. MONROE of Fall River, Mass., left a will with the following clause: "In case my horse, Daisy, survives me, I give her and all her belongings, carriage, harness, etc., to my niece, Anna B. W. Munroe. And I leave in trust my money in the Fall River Savings Bank, also my Troy mill stocks and my Richard Borden mill stock, the income of all to be used for the care and support of the said Daisy." This clause in the will, it is said, endows the dumb animal with $100,000. Daisy, the mare that had the good fortune, is thirty-one years old, is in excellent health, and has the spirit and action of a creature of half the age. She holds her head erect, and they say has eyes and hearing keen as a colt. After the death of the mare the money is to go to the nephews and nieces of the testatrix. The love of dumb animals is beautiful, and proper care for them is a just gratitude; but we think love of the animal as against that of relations was overemphasized, as it is sometimes done. The interest on three or four thousand dollars would have been ample provision for the horse, and the relatives could have had a reasonable allowance, and something could have been left for the poor, the fatherless and the widows. Christ expresses his estimate of the comparative value of the lower tribes and of man.

Ye are of more value than many sparrows. (Matt. 10:31.)

54 Years a Teacher

A TEACHER in the Sunday School of the West Thirty-fourth Street Collegiate Reformed Church of New York City, Mrs. Martha Jane Cleverley, died the other day. One Sunday morning in November, 1857, she gathered three children from the street and took them to a dry goods store which was used as a Sunday School on the Sabbath. She asked to be appointed their teacher, and to be assigned to the infant class. Her class grew like magic, for she went into the homes of the rich and poor alike for recruits. When the West Thirty-fourth Street Church was built she took her class, numbering two hundred and fifty-three pupils, there. When her fiftieth anniversary as a teacher was celebrated, important people from all parts of the city and from all denominations came to pay tribute to the great influence she had exerted on the young life of the community. At that time she had a class of one hundred and seven persons, many of them being grandchildren of those she had taught a half century before. Earth has no figures to compute the value of such a life. In the name of her Master she could say of the thousands committed to her Biblical instruction and spiritual care:

I have taught thee in the way of wisdom; I have led thee in right paths. (Prov. 4 : 11.)

THE TITANIC'S DEAD

By FREDERICK F. SHANNON

("Most of the saved are women and children."—Wireless message.)

WHAT wondrous depths of soul the words relate!
Deeds worthy of the great heroes of old,
High darings these of men of splendid mold
Who plucked the sting from Death's sharp dart, and straight
Into the swirling blackness sank. Nor fate,
Nor fear, nor dark, nor deep, nor ice could steal
The deathless strength of Love their souls reveal,
When swift Death spake and said: O men, be great!"

Valiantly then through that vast shuddering gloom,
When woman's agony and childhood's tears
Answered the Sea's rough call for human toll
These sons of God, within their liquid tomb,
Made Death conceal his face behind Death's fears,
And showed themselves men of titanic soul.

A Story of the Flag

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD: I want to tell you a little story of a CHRISTIAN HERALD flag. My grandson, eight years old, who lives at an army post of which his father was, at the time of which I write, commander, desired to obtain the CHRISTIAN HERALD flag. "I don't know how to get a subscriber; I am afraid the soldiers won't like it," he said to his mamma, but to her reply that she would buy him a flag he answered that he must have "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD flag." He succeeded in getting the company reading rooms to take THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the flag was soon his. He and his thirteen-year-old brother Paul raised a large pole in front of his father's quarters with necessary pulleys, and for a few mornings the happy little man was up before six o'clock in the morning to run his flag up with the garrison flag.

Now I am going to tell the sad mission it has fulfilled within the last few days. Our darling Paul, bright, active, and seemingly well, was stricken down, and in one week lay in the casket, which was draped in the flag which he too loved.

Many beautiful flowers were above and below the flag, but it took a prominent part, for the soldiers who arranged the hall and casket knew the history of the flag.

I am an old grandma, not used to writing, but if you can condense this for the children I will be glad. If not, my love for the dear CHRISTIAN HERALD, which has been so much to me and mine for a great many years, will never be less. Yours,

MRS. E. A. C.

Called Higher

Harriet Faville was laid to rest in Melville, N. D., where she died February 7, 1911.

Mrs. Susan Hare (74), of Waverly, W. Va., was called home last spring. She was for many years a reader of this paper.

G. B. Ames, of San Juan Bautista, Calif., died May 31, 1911. He was a devoted Christian and reader of this paper.

Mr. Thomas J. Fitch, of New York City, was called higher on May 30, 1911. He was a life subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Eliza B. Armstrong (54) died at her home in Geneva, N. Y., July, 1911. She was for many years a reader of this paper.

Mrs. Fred Frech, of Raritan, N. J., entered into rest June 11, 1911. She had for many years been a worker in the Master's vineyard.

Z. R. Mason (72), of Lima, O., passed to his eternal reward on June 11, 1911. He was a constant reader of this paper for nearly twenty years.

William McDonald (80), of Shelby, O., was called home in July last. He was an earnest Christian and a long-time reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. Abbie C. Pollison, of Newark, N. J., passed away June 23, 1911, after a long life of service to others. To the last she was a devoted reader of this paper.

R. B. Tomlinson, Sr., of Minneapolis, Minn., died May 20, 1911. He was for many years a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and had subscribed to it for many of his friends.

Mrs. E. E. Palmer (70), of Forest Dale, O., departed this life April 17, 1911. She was a faithful Christian and a great admirer of this magazine, which she had taken for many years.

Mrs. Artelissa Parker (72), of Pitcher, N. Y., died suddenly on August 3, 1911. She had been a reader of this paper for many years, and was to the last steadfast in her Christian life.

Adelia Clarisa Davis (82) died in the home of her daughter at McLean, Texas, January 1, 1911. Mrs. Davis had read the Bible through 145 times, and was a devoted reader also of this publication.

Another Wise Man

By Eugene Thwing

IN HIS beautiful tale of the East, Henry Van Dyke has told the story of The Other Wise Man—a story that has brought its charm and its meaning into all our hearts. But there is yet a story untold, not a strange story of the other wise man, but just the plain human story of an other Wise Man. His name has not the poetic rhythm of "Artaban"; it is so commonplace a name that perhaps it may better remain unrecorded. His house stands not in a fair garden, mid a tangle of flowers and fruit-trees watered by streams from Mount Orontes. From his roof he can not look "over the sevenfold battlements of black and white and crimson and blue and red and silver and gold, to the hill where the summer palace of the Parthian emperors glittered like a jewel in a crown." His house stands huddled with many others in the crowded, noisy city. From his windows he can look over against a dull, monotonous row of houses like his own, or down to the hard stone pavement and the passing traffic of trade which is no respector of residential neighborhoods.

The wisdom of this man does not proclaim itself in any rich robe of pure white wool over a tunic of silk, nor in massive golden collar, nor winged circles of gold on his breast. In all such respects he is very unlike the other wise man, Artaban, of long ago. He is only a commonplace man of to-day, living in a modest home, wearing plain attire, and working hard day by day; but his heart is like the heart of Artaban, and he, too, has learned the beginning of wisdom.

SOMETHING has stirred a latent passion in the man's heart. His daily work kept him in its leash from early morning till long after others were resting in their homes or enjoying social pleasures. Yet although his task drove him hard, his eyes and his ears took in some knowledge of the burdens and the sorrows and the needs of others. His sympathies were keenly responsive. Instinctively he suffered with those who suffered, and instinctively he longed to help them, but this longing was always repressed and stifled by a sense of his own helplessness as a poor man and a slave to his work.

Then, one day, a message seemed to come straight to him through a preacher in the pulpit. The subject was Service—a humble service that kept self in the background; a kingly service that established kinship with the divine Lord and Servant of all; a glad service that carried cheer into the places of gloom and discouragement; a service that cost in pain and sacrifice and hearts' blood, if need be, thus proving its worth and sharing in some slight degree the glory of the Cross; a service of pure love, melting cold hearts and winning victories for the Master and answering his challenge: "Lovest thou me? Feed my sheep."

The man's heart burned within him, and he registered a vow that when the task that held him in its clutches was finished; when his present obligations were met; when he could shake himself free from the struggle which was taking all his time and strength and courage—then he would respond gladly to the call to service for others in need.

Surely his promise was fair; surely it was all that was possible now. Why then did the call seem to come to him again and again? A book brought it home to him in new and startling form; an article in his favorite paper seemed aimed at him; other messages from the pulpit repeated the same impelling call to service. Again he made his pledge for future obedience, and prayed earnestly that his present difficulties might be solved and his present task completed speedily, that he might be free to give himself to a life of service. It would be wrong to neglect the duties and obligations now pressing upon him, he told himself. Does not the Lord desire justice rather than sacrifice? Is not society and the state better served by the man who carries his own burdens than by one who would neglect his own in order to rush to the help of another?

SLOWLY, little by little, the answer came to him. Perhaps the revelation was gained, step by step, together with his own working out of the solution. God answers many prayers simply by helping us to answer them ourselves by the natural process of sincere, faithful effort. The man seemed to gain a clearer vision. He saw that as he worked, through the strain and stress of the day, he came in contact with other workers who also felt the strain and the stress. Sometimes he could see that it hurt them almost to the point of defeat. As he carried his own burden, he saw others near him in business carrying burdens, too, and often they were near to being crushed to earth by the weight of their loads. He was surprised to find how much he could help them, without going out of his way, and without stopping his own work for a moment. If he maintained a cheerful, patient spirit amid the vexations of the day it really made things look brighter for his fellow workers and his business associates who needed such an influence. If he spoke bravely and optimistically wherever he went, it actually helped others who heard him to fight their battles with greater courage. If he dealt honorably and kindly, the example seemed to be contagious.

Soon the man began to realize that the weak and the suffering and the heavy-laden and the brothers in need were not all afar off, awaiting him in some other field of labor, but that they were touching him on every side and every day as he went about his own work. He found that service began in being, and that the doing was an inevitable result. A voice seemed to come to him in the silence, saying, "Your service for the Master and for your needy brother is appointed to you in the heat and burden of the day. Do not wait; feed now my sheep. Keep on with your task; fight your battle through; but gain from them that greater strength and courage which shall make you better able to serve your brother. Your service will broaden as you prove equal to the service close at hand. When you have been faithful over a few things, then I will make you ruler over many things."

THE CHALLENGE TO DEATH

This message from the great poet whose centennial is now being celebrated fits the courage of the men who perished in the Titanic tragedy.

FEAR death?—to feel the fog in my throat,
The mist in my face,
When the snows begin, and the blasts denote
I am nearing the place,
The power of the night, the press of the storm,
The post of the foe;
Where he stands, the Arch-Fear in a visible form,
Yet the strong man must go:
For the journey is done and the summit attained,
And the barriers fall,
Though a battle's to fight ere a guerdon be gained,
The reward of it all.
I was ever a fighter, so—one fight more.
The best and the last!
I would hate that death bandaged my eyes, and forebore,
And bade me creep past.
No! let me taste the whole of it, fare like my peers
The heroes of old,
Bear the brunt, in a minute pay glad life's arrears
Of pain, darkness, and cold.
For sudden the worst turns the best to the brave,
The black minute's at end,
And the elements' rage, the fiend-voices that rave
Shall dwindle, shall blend,
Shall change, shall become first a peace out of pain,
Then a light, then thy breast,
O thou soul of my soul! I shall clasp thee again,
And with God be the rest!

ROBERT BROWNING.

A POET

INTO a tissue of remembered things
He weaves the moonbeams and the threads of mist,
And colors it with sweet imaginings,
Cloudy embroideries, by sunset kissed.
He sees among the dewdrops on the ferns
The fleeting prototype of children's tears,
And in the music of the running burns
The pent-up laughter of a thousand years.
Along the dear, familiar paths he knows,
The sigh that marks the crossing of the way,
The dreams that haunt the petals of the rose,
And all the wonders of a quiet day;
So glide away the years with minstrelsy—
The magic of his boundless fantasy.

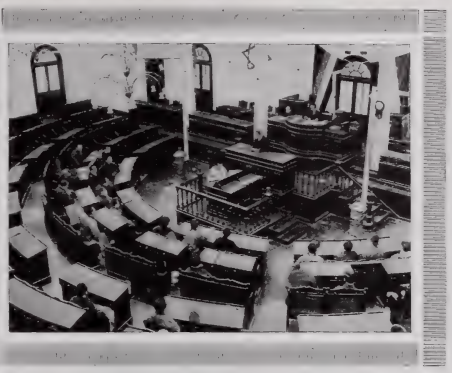
Launching China's Ship of State

THE latest news and the most recently arrived photographs from China seem to indicate that in her change from monarchical to republican rule the "Middle Flower Nation" is encountering all the shoals and currents that beset a ship of state on such a voyage. Money difficulties are undoubtedly the root of most of the new republic's troubles, but these have manifested themselves in such violent forms of revolt and pillage and vandalism that the symptoms have almost obscured the real disease. The inability of the government to appease the Northern soldiers by prompt payment started the dissatisfaction, which, for a time, threatened the life of President Yuan Shi Kai and the very existence of the city of Peking. The approaches to the western section of the foreign quarter about the legations were barricaded with sandbags and guarded by United States troops, while the British, French, Germans, Austrians and Japanese looked after the protecting walls and open spaces on the other sides. The correspondent of one of the American daily papers writes:

"'Bandits,' runs a Chinese proverb, 'go through the land like a coarse comb; but the government's soldiers clean it up like a fine-tooth comb.' It is a proverb that has its roots in centuries of experience. Here the soldier is a man shunned by his fellows. To the peaceful, hard-working, law-abiding people who form the mass of the population of this land the army means anything and everything except an instrument for the protection of property and the preservation of peace.

"The soldiers of China's new army may not evince knowledge of system in the work soldiers are supposed to perform, but there was no lack of system in their looting. Some officers participated, but not many. However, the officers were not needed. The men apportioned the city among the different commands and went about their work as if it was their life's work, as with many it was. This Third Division was recruited in Manchuria. When they are at home these valiant braves follow the pleasing occupation of the hung-hu-tze, which in plain English means bandit. Their method of operation was to 'shoot up' a street, clear it of the police, who required no extraordinary inducement to disappear from the scene of trouble, post their sentinels and detail men to ransack one shop after another until everything worthy their notice was stolen."



Dr. Sun Yat Sen Presiding Over China's First Parliament

Of the same incident the correspondent of an English weekly says:

"After two nights of looting and incendiarism on the part of the mutinous troops, a number of executions were made in the streets. In nearly all cases the condemned were civilians of the coolie class; they were the men who followed on the heels of the soldiery and took what they could. The actual men who broke into the shops were not among those beheaded. The bodies were left about the streets as a warning, in some cases the heads being suspended by three bamboos placed in the form of a tripod. On March 3, upon the arrival of additional foreign troops from Tientsin, a demonstration was made by a united force of British, French, German, American, Russian, Italian, Austrian, Dutch, and Japanese. The troops first assembled on the glacis of the British legation, and then, under the direction of the British commanding officer, made a march of seven or eight miles through the principal streets of the Tartar city." In spite of this tumult and unrest the missionaries feel that the outlook is bright—that in this time of danger there is promise of an awakening that will open China to Christ as never before.

Revolutionary Officials Entertaining the Central China Conference of the M. E. Church

The officials of the revolutionary republican government of the Fukien Province, and the Central Conference of China of the Methodist Episcopal Church, photographed in Foochow, December, 1911, at a reception given to the Conference by the officials. Those seated in the front row are: Rev. W. A. Noble, Korea; Dr. F. D. Gamewell; Hon. Wong Nai Siong, Secretary of Posts and Communications (a Christian for forty years); Hon. Pang, Lieutenant Governor; General Seong, Governor; Bishop Bashford; Bishop Oldham of Malaysia; Rev. A. E. Chennoweth, Philippine Islands; Mrs. Hobart, Dr. Hobart, Peking; Hon. Ding Ning Gong, Secretary of Foreign Affairs (a Christian, son of a Methodist preacher).

OUR COMFORT CORNER

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A Modern Reformer

AS PICTURESQUE a figure as any in history, as brave as the lion-like Martin Luther, as sweet of temper as the saintly Melanchthon, and as fiery as Savonarola was Charles Loyson, who breathed his last in Paris on February 3 at the age of eighty-five. More familiarly known as Père Hyacinthe, this great Frenchman shared with an equally great German, Dr. Doellinger, the honor of leading a revival of religion and inaugurating a new reformation in the modern Church of Rome.

Père Hyacinthe began his noble career as a Carmelite Brother. The order of Carmelite monks is rigid to excess in holding fast to personal self-denial, and it was as a bare-footed monk pledged to life-long poverty that Hyacinthe started in his early youth. He was not so much a man of vast learning and marked talent as a man of flaming genius and deep piety. As an orator he compelled attention. Step by step he awakened envy among the brethren of his order, but this he could have endured. It was his gradual discovery of existing evils in the church of his love that led him to yearn for her purification.

He never became a Protestant in the extreme Puritan sense. His return was to the Old Catholic Church as he saw it in the days of the apostles. Together Père Hyacinthe and Dr. Doellinger, the one a German and the other a Frenchman, became the founders of the Old Catholics, many of whom worship God to-day in various continental countries. It is to be hoped that they may be the leaven that shall yet leaven the whole lump, and redeem the ancient Roman Church from some of its enormous errors.

In 1869 Père Hyacinthe, too liberal, brave and evangelistic to be retained in the ranks of the Carmelites, was solemnly expelled from the order as an apostate. Thus he entered into the procession of those of whom the world is not worthy. Henceforward, with singular nobility and magnetic charm, he went forward on his chosen work, everywhere attracting crowds and everywhere doing good. It should be added that it was Père Hyacinthe's open opposition to the decree of papal infallibility that in reality forced him out of the Roman communion.

In 1872 he married an American gentlewoman, originally Miss Emily Butterfield, of Oswego, New York. Father Hyacinthe had been her friend and teacher. Their marriage proved ideally happy. No one who had the privilege of meeting Madame Loyson can forget her dignity, sweetness and grace.

A son was born to them, and it is his child who is represented in the picture here presented. Père Hyacinthe in his old age had the joy of beholding the second generation, and was as devoted a grandfather as one might find in a long day's search. He was fond of all children and they in return adored him.

Mr. Loyson's wife survives him, in her eightieth year. His last words were, "I am filled with a feeling of joy and well-being. I can appear before God, for I am at peace with my conscience and my reason."

A Question for Discussion

HERE is a question presented for discussion. The readers of this page are invited to send their opinions, writing on one side only of the paper, and saying briefly which girl they think would not only make this man the better wife, but which of them would have the better chance for happiness should she wed him. The answers should not be more than two hundred words in length. Address them to the editor of this page in the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

WHICH OF THE TWO SHALL HE CHOOSE?

A certain young man is deeply in love with a Spanish-American girl of South American birth. She is very quick-tempered and tells him that sometimes she loves him and at other times she hates him. They have frequent quarrels, but always "make up" again. The man is of mingled Italian, French and English origin, English predominating. His temper matches hers and takes fire at a touch.

Another girl of a different type has occasionally given him the pleasure of her company. She treats him with reserve, although she seems to like him. He admires her and says that she is very nice. She is mild and gentle, of an equable temperament, and always has a pleasant smile. In dress and personal appearance she is extremely dainty; she is fond of outdoor sport, but cares nothing for the usual evening social amusements.

The editor of the Family Page has her personal opinion, and would willingly give the young man advice if she thought he would follow it. What do you say, gentle reader? The question is open to women and men, and it will be particularly interesting to hear from the latter.

Luggage

THE wise traveler carries as little weight as possible when he sets out on the journey. The Romans called luggage impedimenta, and the name was well chosen. There is one variety of weight that we women carry which it would be well for us to leave behind in the day's work. We can never remind ourselves too often that worry means waste, and that most of our worrying is over what may happen and never materializes in anything actual or tangible. If somebody is away from home or ill, or has delayed writing, imagination paints every possible disaster as having occurred, and we are disturbed beyond measure. A letter comes from the other side of the globe, bringing with it a little forecast of hitherto unexpected loss; and, quite forgetting the time that has elapsed between its writing and our receiving, we weary ourselves with conjecture and alarm. Meanwhile, the shadow has passed and the sun come out, and our worry is all in vain. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." We own in fee one little moment of time. Yesterday is gone, to-morrow is not here.

It may be added that we need our strength for that which actually does happen. Why fritter it away recklessly? In the training of children it is well to show them both by precept and example that the duty in hand is the positive duty, and that they must not begin to let their little worries, that are large to them, overcast their happiness.

"IF WE BUT KNEW"

IF WE but knew that through the closing door
Some one we love would enter nevermore,
Would we not hasten with our richest store?
If we but knew!

If we but knew that from the market-place
Soon we should miss some kind familiar face,
Would our cold greetings not be touched with grace?
If we but knew!

If we but knew some heart beside our own
Had walked in dark Gethsemane alone,
Oh, with what largesse would our love be shown!
If we but knew!

Dear Jesus, patient, understanding, kind,
We are thy lost sheep in a winter wind.
Forgive us that we are so wilful blind!
Teach us to know!

A Woman's Last Impressions of the Great Liner

ONE of the most comprehensive and connected stories of the disaster was that recounted by Mrs. A. A. Dick, wife of a merchant in Calgary, Canada.

"We were awakened in our cabin on hearing the crash. Together with my husband I made my way to one of the decks and learned that the steamship had struck an iceberg. We could see the iceberg. The night was clear and the sky was filled with stars. We were indifferent about leaving the steamship, as we did not believe it was going to sink. We put off in the third boat. We had not gone far when we realized the big liner was sinking. Then, at a safe distance, away from the possibility of suction, we saw one deck after another sink from view. We could see men jumping into the water and could hear terrifying screams and shouts of distress. We heard several rounds of shots echoing across the water and learned afterward that many men were shot down as the last boat put away. There were three men shot in the steerage by the second or third officer, we understand. As the steamship went down the band was up forward and we could faintly hear the strains of 'Nearer, My God, to Thee.'"—New York Herald.

Colonel Gracie, an American Army Officer, Went Down with the Ship, but Was Rescued

COLONEL ARCHIBALD GRACIE, U.S.A., the last man saved, went down with the vessel, but was picked up. Colonel Gracie told a remarkable story of personal hardship and denied emphatically the reports that there had been any panic on board.

Colonel Gracie told how he was driven to the topmost deck when the ship settled, and was the sole survivor after the wave that swept her just before her final plunge had passed.

"I jumped with the wave," said he, "just as I often have jumped with the breakers at the seashore. When the ship plunged down I was forced to let go and I was swirled around and around for what seemed to be an interminable time. Eventually I came to the surface to find the sea was a mass of tangled wreckage. Luckily I was unhurt, and casting about managed to seize a floating wooden grating near by.

"When I had recovered my breath I discovered a large canvas and cork life-raft which had floated up. A man, whose name I did not learn, was struggling toward it from some wreckage to which he had clung. I cast off and helped him to get upon the raft and we then began the work of rescuing those who had jumped into the sea and were floundering in the water.

"When dawn broke there were thirty of us on the raft standing knee deep in the icy water and afraid to move lest the craft be overturned. Several unfortunates, benumbed and half dead, besought us to save them, and one or two made an effort to reach us, but we had to warn them away. Had we made any effort to save them we all might have perished.

"The hours that elapsed before we were picked up by the Carpathia were the longest and most terrible I ever spent."—New York American.

Mr. Beasley, One of the British Passengers, Tells How the Last Boat Got Away

HERE is the account of Mr. Beasley, of London: "I had been in my berth for about ten minutes when at about fifteen minutes after eleven o'clock I felt a slight jar and then soon after a second one, but not sufficiently large to cause any anxiety to any one, however nervous he may have been. However, the engines stopped immediately afterward, and I first thought 'she has lost a propeller.' I went up on the top (boat) deck in a dressing gown and found only a few people there, who had come up similarly to inquire why we had stopped, but there was no sort of anxiety in the minds of any one.

"We saw through the smoking-room window a game of cards going on and went in to inquire if they knew anything; it seems they felt more of the jar, and, looking through the window, had seen a huge iceberg go by close to the side of the boat. . . . The game went on without any thought of disaster and I retired to my cabin to read until we went on again. As I dressed I heard an order shouted: 'All passengers on deck with life-belts on.' . . . The ship was absolutely still, and except for a gentle tilt downward, which I don't think one person in ten would have noticed at that time, no signs of the approaching disaster were visible. She lay just as if she were waiting the order to go on again when some trifling matter had been adjusted. But in a few moments we saw the covers lifted from the boats, and the crews standing by and coiling up the ropes. . . . Presently we heard the order: 'All men stand back away from the boats and all women retire to next deck below'—the smoking-room deck or B deck. The men all stood away and remained in absolute silence leaning against the end railings of the deck or pacing slowly up and down. The boats were swung out and lowered from A deck. When they were to the level of B deck where all the women were collected, the women got in, with the exception of some who refused to leave their husbands. In some cases they were torn from them and pushed into the boats, but in many instances they were allowed to remain because there was no one to insist they should go. . . . . I remained where I was, and presently heard the call: 'Any more women?' Looking over the side of the ship I saw the boat No. 13 swinging level with B deck, half full of women. Again the call was repeated: 'Any more women?' I saw none come on and then one of the crew looked up and said: 'Any women on your deck, sir?' 'No,' I replied. 'Then you had better jump.' I dropped in and fell in the bottom. As they cried 'lower away' and the boat began to descend, two women were pushed hurriedly through the crowd on B deck and heaved over into the boat, and a baby of ten months was passed down after them."—New York Herald.

A Woman's Story of the Calm Heroism of Passengers and Sailors Alike, that Impressed her as She Left the Titanic

MRS. TURRELL CAVENDISH, daughter of Henry Siegel, and one of the survivors of the Titanic disaster, told the following story of her experience:

"I was with my husband in the stateroom when the accident happened. He awakened me—I remember it was just midnight—and told me something was the matter with the boat. I dressed quickly, putting on a fur coat, and we went to the deck.

"It was a beautiful night. The stars were shining and the sky was clear. There was absolute quiet and good order everywhere at this time. We were assured that there was no danger—that the boat could not sink.

"For twenty minutes, I should say, there was no intimation of danger. Then suddenly the cry went up: 'Save your lives!' It rings in my ears yet.

"There were many lifeboats then preparing to dip down and I ran with my husband for one of them. He had some biscuits in his pocket and he gave them to me. Then he kissed me and put me into a boat in which were twenty-three women. He told me to go and that he would stay on the ship with the other men. They were happy to see their wives lowered away in the boats. They kept telling us they would be all right because the boat could not sink.

Big Ben

If you'd rise early, just say when,
And leave your call with me—Big Ben

BIG BEN is on the job every minute of the day; he rings on time—he runs on time—he stays on time.

He has a great big dial you can easily read in the dim morning light—a cheerful, deep toned voice that wakes you on your sleepiest mornings—large strong winding keys that are a pleasure to wind—and selective alarm calls that ring just when you want and either way you want, steadily for 5 minutes or intermittently for 10.

Big Ben stands 7 inches tall, slender, massive, handsome.—16,000 watchmakers have already adopted him. Counterfeits are everywhere trying to cash in on him, he has all the ear marks of a full-fledged success. —If you cannot find him at your jeweler's, a money order sent to his designers, Westclox, La Salle, Illinois, will bring him to you express charges prepaid

A Shape Without a Seam

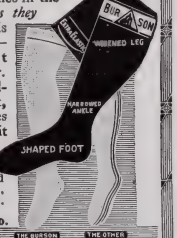
A fit without a fault—that's the whole story of Burson Hose!

The usual way to get the "full-fashioned" shape is by means of a seam, but the Burson way makes this usual seam useless; Burson gets the same results—shape, style, fit and wearing qualities without the bulky row of stitching.

BURSON

The Burson machines are the only machines in the world that fit as they knit, and the fit is there to stay—proof against washing and wear.

At all good dealers; or, if not, write us. The sizes are varied to suit all women—stout and slender.



Prices, mercerized 75c, 50c, lisle 35c, cotton 25c and 19c.

"A Better Day's Profits"

is the title of a new Burroughs Book on Scientific Management in the Retail Business.

It tells the Principles by which the most successful Retailers have cut out the wastes and losses and multiplied their profits.

It shows how chain stores, with cut prices, make money while driving the little fellows out of business.

The manager of any Retail store can get one copy without charge or obligation by asking for it on his letterhead. Others can get the book at 50 cents a copy—stamps or money.

Glasca the day tryin' to get money oot o' him."

Mr. Redhorn opened his ledger without remark.

"So," said Willie, "it strikes me ye've aboot burst P. Smith—eh?"

"I've jist been reckonin' up that I've lost aboot a hundred pound in the twelvemonth," said the painter, his eyes on the ledger.

"But ye've burst him noo."

"Haud yer tongue, leddie!" Mr. Redhorn cried with sudden heat.

Willie gasped at his master. "I thocht ye wud be pleased," he said at last.

"Maybe I'm ower pleased for words," was the reply. The painter continued more gently: "Onywey, we'll converse on ither subjects, Wullie. Efter a', it's a terrible thing to see a fellow creature beat—espaycially a fellow creature wi' a wife an' five sma' weans—"

"Six," said Willie.

"Ay, six. I had got into the habit o' thinkin' o' five," said Mr. Redhorn simply. "Drink up, an' I'll walk hame wi' ye."

About two hours later P. Smith came out of the beer-shop. He had had some beer—not much, for his money was done, and no one had offered to treat him. He had spent the evening in a corner by himself. He came forth alone. The snow was falling densely and there was a breeze from the southeast. He could see no one abroad in the village. He crossed the road and stood against the sea-wall, beyond the rays of light from the few windows which had not been shuttered. Gradually his figure became white. Beneath him, invisible, the sea cried softly. . . .

Ere long the door of the beer-shop opened and the last of its patrons came forth and hurried homewards. The outer door was shut and bolted; a little later the window went black. Other lights went out in the village until only two were left—one close at hand, the other very far (so it seemed) away. The near light was in the house of Joseph Redhorn, the distant one in that of the man standing by the sea-wall.

Some minutes passed, and then P. Smith moved in the direction of the nearer light. But he did not move far. Halting, he shook his head. A sob burst from his throat. Turning abruptly, he almost ran towards the pier. Presently he was fumbling at the gate.

"I think it's locked," said a timid voice, and Mr. Redhorn stepped from the porch of the pier-house.

For a moment P. Smith peered at him; then he leaned against the gate, speechless, trembling.

Mr. Redhorn cleared his throat. "It—it—it's a bad nicht for folk wi' chilblains," he remarked, "but I—I had to come oot for a breather for ma dyspeepsia. That's hoo I happen to be here. . . . Weel, seein' we've met, what d'ye say to a glass o' harmless ginger wine at ma fireside afore ye gang hame, Smith?" Without waiting a reply, he put his arm through the other's.

P. Smith went with him like a sleepy child. Indoors he allowed his coat to be removed, himself to be conducted to his host's chair, and a glass of ginger wine to be placed in his hand—without a word.

"Sup it up," said Mr. Redhorn. "I'll ha'e one masel'." They drank in silence.

It was not until the host had taken the guest's empty glass that the dazed look began to pass from the latter's face.

Ocean's Greatest Tragedy

"We were lowered into the water without any light. There were two sailors and twenty-three women. Only one man tried to get into the boat. He was pushed back by a sailor.

"We rowed away from the ship. I can still see those husbands kissing their wives and telling them good-by. I can see the sailors standing by so calm and brave. As we rowed away I could still see the men aboard the Titanic very plainly. They helped other women into the boats until all the boats were full and had pulled away. For a long time none of us women spoke. Many were choked with tears and all seemed dumb with the suddenness of the terrible thing that had happened.

"An awful scream startled me. I could see the men rush across the decks of the Titanic to one end of the boat. It seemed like two explosions, one after another. The end of the boat tipped high in the air, and all the men rushed for this end. I could see some of them jump overboard. But the powerful suction drew them down after the ship."—New York American.

Two Hours of the Cries of the Drowning, Then Silence

MR. HENRY J. FRAUENTHAL, the well-known New York physician, one of the survivors of the Titanic, gave the following account of the catastrophe to a New York American reporter:

"We rowed away in the lifeboat, I should think, for about a mile. It was black night. There was no light on the Titanic, as the lights there had gone out, I am told, five minutes before she sank.

"I could not, of course, see the ship go down at the distance we were, but I heard the cries and screams of those who were on the ship, and, perhaps, too, of those who were in the water trying to save themselves by clinging to life-preservers. We heard these cries for fully two hours, while we were riding the waves a mile away. Then the cries died down and finally all was still, except the noise of the oars in our boat and the swish of the waters."

Noble Relief Work

MANY persons and organizations joined in the splendid work of relief for the survivors. A relief committee was organized under the direction of Mrs. Nelson Herrick Henry, on which Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Mrs. Edward H. Harriman, Mrs. Chas. B. Alexander and other prominent women served. St. Luke's Hospital offered the use of its new ward, and other hospitals offered accommodations. The Salvation Army opened its headquarters building at Fourteenth Street for the care of the men who were in need, and its home on Fifteenth Street to shelter women. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offered to put the commodious and well-equipped buildings of its Children's Home in Nyack at the disposal of the survivors. Besides the sums raised by the Relief Committee a large fund was collected under the direction of Mayor Gaynor. Subscriptions to the relief funds were started in London as well as in New York. King George contributed $2,500, Queen Mary $1,250, Queen Alexandra $1,000. J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. subscribed $10,000, Andrew Carnegie $5,000. Twenty-five thousand dollars were contributed by the New York Stock Exchange and the passengers on the Carpathia made up a large purse for their companions at sea. On the pier splendid work was done by nurses, deaconesses, Sisters of Charity, Salvation Army officers and others, who were at hand to relieve the sufferings of the sick and injured.

THE OPPOSITION MAN

Mr. Redhorn went over to the sink and made a great work of washing the glasses, letting the water run its hardest. But even so he heard the sobs. . . .

When at last he seated himself opposite his guest, it would have been hard to say which of the two was the paler.

P. Smith wet his lips. "How did you know?" he said hoarsely.

"I didna know, I dinna know, an' I'll never know," Mr. Redhorn replied. "An' I've nae questions to ask. Likewise I've nae memory."

"But—but what took ye to the pier?"

"I forget."

"Was it you that looked into the beer-shop about nine o'clock?"

"Maybe it was." Mr. Redhorn winced at the recollection of the man's desperate look.

"And you thought—?"

"Man, I tell ye I forget. Ha'e some mair ginger wine, an', if ye like, I'll walk hame wi' ye. Mistress Smith'll maybe—"

"I wasna worth the savin'," cried P. Smith; "I wasna worth the savin'."

"Ye wudna ha'e said that a year back, an' ye'll no say it a—a month hence," said Mr. Redhorn, not quite steadily.

"We came to Fairport," said P. Smith huskily, "because I thought it would be good for the children."

"Surely," Mr. Redhorn murmured.

"And I—I had the notion o' startin' on my own account."

"Jist that."

"My wife—my wife thought I was better in the situation I was in."

"Did she?"

There was a pause.

"Noo an' then," said Mr. Redhorn cautiously, "a woman's richt. It happens so—occasionally. Ay—to be sure—precisely. Maybe," he went on with an effort, "maybe Mistress Smith'll be wonderin'—"

The visitor half rose and sank back. He was not yet fit to stand. His eyes, once so bright and alert, fell before Mr. Redhorn's, always so dull and tired.

"Oh God," he whispered, "I'm done!"

"Na, na," said Mr. Redhorn, nervously. "Ye maun never say that this side o' the tomb. Man, Smith," he cried aloud, "I'm vexed for ye—sair vexed for ye. I—I didna want ye here; but—but I dinna like to see ony man beat. But maybe ye're no beat yet?"

"I'm finished. Oh, you know it, after what you've seen to-night."

Mr. Redhorn stood up, his long, thin body quivering. "Oh, Lord," he whispered, "is there ony human business that isna somehoo damnable in thy sicht?" He stole towards the other man and laid a hand on his shoulder. "Smith, if I had been a younger man it's likely I wud ha'e got beat. It was just a question o' age an' a wee bit capital."

"I've been a dunderin' fool," mumbled P. Smith. "I saw I was wrong at the start, but I wouldn't turn back. My wife—"

"Ye didna ha'e a chance," Mr. Redhorn began to pat his guest's shoulder. "See here, Smith; what are ye gaun to dae?"

"Go bankrupt."

"Na, na— Are ye—are ye agin takin' a seetuation again?"

"There's a situation waiting for me, in Glasgow—if I could get away from here."

"An' why—"

"Redhorn, I'm stuck up here wi' debt."

"Much?"

A sob, or something like it.

"Hoo much, Smith?"

"N-near fifty pound."

Mr. Redhorn walked slowly to the window and back. After considerable hesitation he said:

"Yer stock-in-tred'll be worth something. What wud ye be askin' for it?"

"Redhorn, if I was offered a fair job to-morrow, I couldn't take it—for want o' stuff."

"Weel, weel— What aboot goodwill?"

At this P. Smith almost laughed. "Goodwill! Oh, tush! What goodwill has a broken business like mine?"

Again Mr. Redhorn laid his hand on his guest's shoulder.

"Apart frae yer business," he said, "I hereby—I hereby offer ye fifty pound—cash—for yer goodwill."

It was still snowing when they set out.

"Ye're lucky no to ha'e chilblains." Mr. Redhorn spoke in jerky fashion. "An' ye'll no come to ma hoose till late to-morrow nicht, mind, for it's a secret atween us. I'm glad ye're no afflicted wi' the dyspeepsia, which is a trial for onybody wi' artistic feelin's. An' I'll ha'e the cash ready, so as ye can get awa' frae Fairport when it suits ye. Mind, ye're no to think ye got beat here. If ye had come twinty years later, I wud ha'e fled frae the fray, so to speak. Ye jist happened to arrive at the wrang time. An' I'll come an' see ye when I'm in Glesca, an' maybe Mistress Smith'll gie me a dish o' tea. An' I trust ye'll be fruitful an' multiply an'—etceetera. I think I best awa' hame noo." He held out his hand. "An I forgive ye for yer remark aboot the hydropathic hippopotamus an' the insane sassiges."

"Oh," said poor P. Smith, and got no further.

"Mistress Smith'll maybe—" began Mr. Redhorn, stopped short, and literally ran away.

The P. Smiths left Fairport within the week. Doubtless it was by the merest chance that Mr. Redhorn happened to be on the pier at their departure, and Mr. Danks ever afterwards declared it was rank hypocrisy that made the painter shake hands with them all, including the infant.

And even Willie still believes that his master "burst the opposeetion man."

Among the Workers

—The Society of Inner Mission and Rescue Work, 56 Pine St., New York, of which the Rev. V. A. W. Mortensen is president, reports a successful year's work for 1911. From the mission at New York, at which there was a total attendance of 48,000, clothing was given to more than 400 persons, meals to 300, beside special dinner baskets at Thanksgiving and Christmas. More than 1,800 visits were made to the homes of children; free medical attendance was given to many sick in their homes; over 90,000 pieces of literature were sent out; 300 hospital calls were made and 100 children were given a ten days' outing during the summer. Dr. Mortensen, in addition to this work, is waging a vigorous battle against the "white slave" trade, and recently sent to the penitentiary for a term of twenty years a woman whom he found to be involved in this traffic.

—Mr. Charles W. Candee, of Phœnix, N. Y., who is now in his ninety-fifth year, has been for seventy-four years a member of the Congregational Church of that city. At a communion service held in his church recently, he gave an earnest testimony and related something of his long experience. "I was twenty years old," he said, "when I stood in this same place and became a member of this society. That was in 1838, on the first Sunday in March, seventy-four years ago. . . . God never forsook me and he will never forsake you. He will give you strength. And oh! the rest of you who have not accepted Christ, come and be one of us." Mr. Candee is a generous giver to religious enterprises, and last summer presented to the Congregational Church of Phœnix a stone and concrete porch and steps. A remarkable photograph recently taken at Mr. Candee's home shows himself, his son, Charles E., his grandson, Charles M., and a wee great-granddaughter grouped together. He has had the joy of seeing children and grandchildren follow his steps into the Church of Christ. Mr. Candee still has no need of cane or glasses, and friends assert that his hair is not even yet altogether gray. Congratulations and good wishes from The Christian Herald to this grand old veteran of the the Lord's army!

Crisco is purely vegetable. It makes pastry digestible.

Delicious Pie Crust

Tender - Crisp

The simplest way to make it

WOMEN have been told so often that pastries are difficult to make, that many hesitate to attempt even the plainest kind. Pie crust, when made with Crisco, according to the recipe given below, is not in the least difficult to make successfully.

With Crisco, you can get tender crust with a uniformity impossible with lard, or lard and butter.

The flakiness of pie crust depends upon the kind and the amount of shortening used. Lard makes tender crust, but an indigestible one and lacking in the flavor which butter gives. Crisco makes a lighter, flakier crust than lard, with a flavor equal to that given by butter.

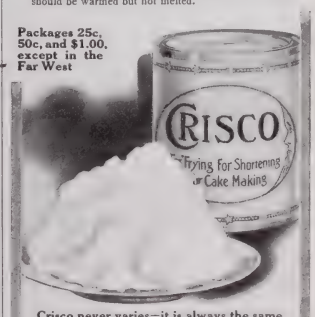
Make Crisco pie crust. This recipe was found by the Crisco Kitchens to be excellent, as the crust was uniformly flaky, tender and delicious.

Try it. You can obtain the same good results.

1 cup flour	5 level tablespoons CRISCO
¾ teaspoon salt	2 tablespoons ice water

Sift flour and salt together, chop in Crisco very fine and add water slowly. Handle lightly. Put the dough on a board, roll ⅜ inch thick, line pan and bake in a hot oven. Have all ingredients cold except Crisco, which should be warmed but not melted.

Packages 25c, 50c, and $1.00, except in the Far West



Crisco never varies—it is always the same

On request, we shall mail a fully illustrated booklet showing many other advantages of Crisco, the new and heretofore unknown, strictly vegetable product for frying, for shortening and for cake making. Address

Happy Cozy Corner Days

Spring in the Valley of the Meuse

GIRLHOOD AND HEROINES—By an American Girl

SPRING in every cranny and crevice of southern Europe is a miracle, but it is from bonny France, from the sweet valley of the Meuse, gay with a million wild flowers and tall lilies, fragrant with young vines and crowned with hills of silvery birches and frail olive trees, that May, sweet girlhood of the year, steps forth upon her hallowed mission to restore the old earth to new life and beauty, and all the world throngs, with infinite love in its heart, to do her homage. So the old Provençal legend goes, and I know, because I have been there in the month of May, that birds do sing like enchanted things, and the brooks, like girlish enthusiasms and fancies, run full and clear in the valley of the Meuse. The showers drop easily and daintily there in the way that our girlish tears are wont to flow, for young affections and graces grow ever up through childhood's dreams with tears to nourish them. And the sunshine in the valley of the Meuse—ah, how it spreads and blesses! White mists, like filmy skirts and scarfs, go trailing through; and to the watcher in the early morning they are the visions of a fuller, riper day. That sounds like girlhood itself, does it not? There is even the solitary ancient beech which legend says is a fairy tree; under its shadow a noble knight once kept tryst with a princess fair, and loved her, and carried her away on his fleet white steed to be happy ever after. So there is young magic in the valley, you see, besides all its maiden beauty.

Just yonder through the woodland, where the river leaps and bounds into the outside world, is the village of Domremy. Joan of Arc, that girl of girls, was born there, and there she lived until, like "Spring" in the legend, she went forth one bright May day, with courage in her heart, to refresh the world with her beauty and high purpose.

If any CHRISTIAN HERALD girl who shall read this little "paper" is not familiar—very familiar, I mean—with the life of Joan of Arc, the peasant girl of Domremy, do get the story somewhere, somehow, and learn to love it. For girlish faith and wonder and inspiration almost no other story compares with it. The more you read it the more you will say to yourself: "How easily all these brave things seem to happen!" and the very simplicity of it will start afresh your own girlish enthusiams.

Turn the leaves of the story book at random here with me, and we shall see that what I say is true. In the early chapters Jeannette, the peasant child, among her brothers and sisters, is going about her little affairs, tending her father's sheep, learning to sew and knit and spin, happy and tired, lovely and glad, lonely at times and telling fairy tales to her doll, just like every other little child. A few chapters further on, and we find Jeanne high-spirited and resolute, yet so sweetly timid and girlish, riding forth from the valley into the great world of France, her face lit up with courage and high purpose, determined to rescue her beloved country from the enemy, never guessing what life yonder has in store for her, but fearlessly sallying forth. I know girls like that to-day, and I am sure you do. It is a way of girls to go about the things they really want to do; headlong and dauntless, and just a bit timid at the same time, and how we love them for it!

In the middle of the book is Jeanne the warrior. Triumphant at the head of ten thousand troops, entering the conquered city: Maid of Orleans she is called now, carrying the sacred lilies of France embroidered bravely on the

It is simply lack of good stories that forces publishers to print so many poor ones. If you had the necessary training you could probably write better ones than some you read. The Emery Course in Short Story Writing, Novel Writing and Journalism have helped very many authors toward fame and fortune. A number of our students are earning big money with their pens. One accepted story may cover the entire cost of training. The terms are easy. Write today for our Booklet 21. We criticise and publish manuscripts.

Questions and Answers

A. E. X., Waterbury, Conn. What is the correct pronunciation of (1) Iliad; (2) Odyssey; (3) Faust; (4) Dante; (5) Les Miserables; (6) Richelieu; (7) Thucydides; (8) Peloponnesian?

The diacritical marks of the various dictionaries differ to such an extent that the only way to represent sounds unmistakably is to attempt letter combinations which appear somewhat grotesque. The words referred to are pronounced thus: (1) Ill-i-ad; (2) Odd-i-sie; (3) Fowst; (4) Dahn-teh; (5) Lay Miz-er-ahbl; (6) This word has become Anglicized and may be pronounced Rish-i-lyu. If the French pronunciation is preferred the word should be given but two syllables, the last syllable having a sound impossible to represent in English letters, but something like the sound of i in "fir," or e in "her." (7) Thu-sidd-i-dees; (8) Pell-o-pon-nees-i-an.

J. W. H., Eugene, Ore. How was Apollonius of Tyana, philosopher or mystic, regarded by the early Christians? Was he a Christian, or simply "a good man"?

Apollonius of Tyana was variously regarded, some holding him to be an imposter and professed magician. His life, as written by Philostratus, is filled with fables and miracles in imitation of the life of Christ. Dubin wrote convicting him of falsehood and imposture. He was a Pythagorean philosopher and mystic, a great traveler, and was revered by multitudes who credited his impostures and believed in the fabulous accounts of his miracles. Some have held his career to be a pagan parallel to that of Christ, concocted by a group of educated pagans under the patronage of Empress Julia Domna, and intended to deceive the mass of the people.

M. M., Pittsburg, Pa. How many different Protestant denominations are there at the present time in this country? Is there any good reason for the existence of so many Protestant bodies, while all profess to hold the essentials of Christianity in common?

One hundred and eighty-six, according to the last census, which is 41 more than a decade ago. Between 1890 and 1900, twelve denominations disbanded and forty-eight new bodies came into existence, four merged with others and some split in two. According to Mr. A. R. Wells, a close observer, each denomination gives as its reason for independent existence that it "represents a valuable principle," which he concludes to be a "good thing" for the enemies of the church, though not for the church itself.

O. B. C., Amery, Wis. Please inform me who was the founder of the Freemason lodge. When and where did it first originate and what is the strength of the order to-day?

It seems true that the origin of Freemasonry is so ancient as to be literally lost in "the mazes of antiquity." It is said to go back at least to the time of the building of Solomon's temple (B.C. 1012-1005), and Solomon is sometimes mentioned as its founder. The order throughout the world numbers about two million members.

C. J. R., Morrill, Kan. Referring to Matt. 2: 2, was this star which the wise men saw, and which would guide them to the Christ-child, a real star, or was it a conjunction of the three planets appearing at that time as one star, as given by the author of The Other Wise Man?

It was a supernatural light resembling a star in brightness, which appeared in some country far to the east of Jerusalem to men familiar with the study of celestial phenomena and who looked for its appearance in fulfilment of prophecy. Some scientific writers, including Kepler, have assumed it to be a phenomenon which occurred at the time of the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn near the first point of Aries in the constellation of Pisces, and that such a conjunction was held by the magi to portend some great event. These conclusions, however, are probably mere conjecture. Whatever it was and whatsoever form it assumed, it was sufficiently clear and significant to be accepted as a guide. More than one writer has stated that it may have been visible to the magi alone, but we see no reason for this assumption.

B. C. S., Watertown, Wis. 1. Was Jesus actually tempted when Satan tempted him with Jerusalem? 2. Is it wrong to do magical tricks?

1. Certain philosophical writers have interpreted the story of the temptation as a parable, or a vision; but this explanation can not be reconciled with the plain narrative related in the Gospels. The story is one of fact, hard to be understood, "but not to be made easier by explanations which would invalidate the only testimony on which it rests." It was a temptation calculated to appeal strongly to one whom many expected to become the founder of an earthly kingdom—a temptation which offered great power without effort, and the realization of the highest worldly ambition. Some even of Jesus' own followers were looking forward to the inauguration of his temporal reign, with great demonstration. Jesus knew this, and he knew what was in the mind of the tempter when the latter made his offer; but the vision of world power could not move Jesus. "Our Lord submitted to all the liabilities of the human condition," writes one interpreter, "and overcame them all, even the final temptation, which was one calculated to appeal strongly to the worldly ambition." It was an important element in the contest with the powers of evil and was designed to awaken in him sentiments of pride and of love of worldly dominion. The three temptations were addressed to the three forms in which sin makes its appearance in the soul; to the solace of sense, the love of praise, and the desire of power and gain. Jesus was constantly on his guard against the prevailing idea of the establishment of a Messianic kingdom by force, instead of by love. As the record stands, it must be accepted as a real temptation. 2. Feats of sleight-of-hand or legerdemain are innocent enough in themselves, if explained as tricks and not done with intent to deceive.

Reader, Harriman, Tenn. Is it true that the extradition laws cannot lay hands on a person who takes refuge in Cairo, Egypt?

During the independence of Egypt there were no satisfactory extradition arrangements with other countries. As soon as the British Empire assumed a protectorate there, however, the usual extradition treaties were made.

L. S., Atlantic City. Can you tell me who is at the head of the operation of wireless telegraphy at the present time?

There are a number of companies operating wireless telegraph stations and instruments throughout the world. Most of the governments of Europe as well as of America have a number of stations of their own. Different companies have the contracts for supplying wireless apparatus for the use of steamships at sea. William Marconi, the inventor of wireless, is still living. Italian by birth, he is at the head of the largest and most important wireless company in the world.

M. H., Joppa, Tenn. Please tell me what is meant when it is said that the United States has borrowed a shipload of gold; from whom and why this was done, if it is the case?

The statement that the United States has borrowed a shipload of gold only signifies that the debt of the country at the present time if converted into gold coinage would represent a rather respectable shipload. This debt has been accumulating since the War of Independence. It is owed by the government to various foreign banking interests and to the people of the United States as individuals. It is represented by government bonds and other forms of investment.

W. L. E., Liberty, Tenn. Please give a description of the Manx and explain the origin of that word.

The Manx are the inhabitants of the Isle of Man, a small island in the Irish Sea about equidistant from England, Scotland and Ireland. The island is a dominion of the British crown and is ruled over by a royal governor and council and an elected assembly known as the House of Keys. The island comprises about 227 square miles of territory. The Manx are of the Gadhelic Celtic race by descent and have preserved, to perhaps a greater extent than any of the other Celtic nations, the customs of their forefathers. Manx or Manks in the singular is the name of their language or dialect. The word is derived from the name of the island.

Reader, Elmira, N. Y. 1. Where was the Garden of Eden? 2. Where can I buy The Christian Herald Almanac?

1. Many attempts have been made to determine the locality of Eden. Gen. 2: 8-17 describes it, and not a few modern geographers and Orientalists have agreed that the territory which best fulfils the requirements of this description is to be found below the junction of the Euphrates and the Tigris, in Arabia. Others believe it to have been the high table-lands of Armenia. Still others place it in Ceylon. All the continents of the world have been searched for it. The Greeks place it at Beth-Eden, on Lebanon; Herder's History of Mankind located it in the Vale of Cashmere in Upper India. There has been a great deal of literature written on the subject. 2. You can purchase direct from this office, price 25 cents.

Mrs. P. R. P., Hayward, Calif. How many years, according to Bible facts, have elapsed since the world was created? I have seen in books a number of times that it was 6,000 years, and was always taught to believe it.

The Bible nowhere indicates the age of the world, nor the date of creation. In Gen. 1: 1 the language is simply: "In the beginning." The chronological data which you find in many Bibles were compiled by Bishop Ussher, of Dublin, a celebrated divine (1580-1656). He was a man of vast learning, and in computing his chronology, he began with the year 1 A.D.

Compliments abound when the hostess serves a sauce made with Snider's Tomato Catsup.

Superior in quality and flavor.

It has been famous for over a quarter-century as the Catsup to buy. It tastes better. It is made according to the old Snider recipe that has never yet been equalled.

SNIDER'S
Tomato
CATSUP

is made from home-grown tomatoes, picked when just red to the stem. The spices used in Snider's Catsup are seven of the best obtainable. We could pay less; but we use only the best materials for Snider's.

Tone up the less expensive cuts of meat with Snider's Catsup and make them temptingly delicious and more digestible.
Use it on chops, steaks, cutlets, veal loaf, fish, oysters, spaghetti, macaroni, in soups and gravies.

For all dishes improved by a tomato sauce, use this recipe:

SNIDER TOMATO SAUCE

1 tablespoon butter;
1 tablespoon flour;
½ cup Snider's Tomato Catsup;
1 cup hot water.

Heat the butter thoroughly in a granite pan, stir in the flour until smooth, then add catsup and water. Boil for two minutes, stirring constantly.

For spaghetti and macaroni, add some "snappy" grated cheese.

Before native vegetables "come in," or any time, there's a most wholesome and appetizing side dish or "meat course," always ready, in the superior

(the time of Christ's birth) and worked backward as far as reliable historic data existed. He carried his calculations back for a period of 4,000 years, but this he never intended to represent the age of the world, although many have fallen into the error of so understanding it and of assuming, by adding the centuries that have passed since A.D. 1, that the world was therefore 6,000 years old. Rightly understood, there is no conflict between science and Scripture on this subject. Investigations in the last half century have carried back the dawn of history (as revealed by inscriptions and monuments) much further than Ussher reckoned.

O. H. R., Madison, Wis. Where in the Bible do we find that it tells of angels having wings?

Although there is no specific statement to that effect in the Bible, such passages as Isa. 6 and Ezek. 1 and many others have given the impression which we see so frequently reproduced in art. The divine messengers, as spiritual beings, would not necessarily be dependent upon material means for locomotion.

Subscriber, Zanesville, O. 1. Please give the name of the world's highest building, also the height of New York's highest buildings and how many stories they contain. 2. How long is Broadway in New York?

1. The highest building is the Eiffel Tower in Paris. This is over 1,000 feet in height. New York's highest building at the present time is that of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, 700 feet, three inches, and contains fifty stories. The next is the Singer Manufacturing Company Building, 612 feet, one inch, and contains forty-one stories. The third building is that of the Bankers' Trust Company, 539 feet, and contains thirty-nine stories. The Woolworth, which is now in course of construction, will eclipse all these in height and number of stories contained. 2. Broadway, New York, is slightly over twelve miles in length.

E. P. F., Elida, O. What was the amount of the national debt of the United States in 1895, and what is it at the present time?

The national debt of the United States in 1895 was $1,717,481,779.90. On the first of November, 1911, which is the last date upon which a statement was made, the public debt amounted to $2,831,330,305.66.

J. G. B., Dayton, O. What is the meaning of "Shaddai," which Bunyan uses in his Holy War?

It is one of the ancient names applied by the Jews to God and is rendered "Almighty" in the A. V., in many passages. "Shaddai" is the God of power, the irresistible, who punishes and rewards, who protects, who is just, who hears prayer, who chastens men, who is the source of all strength. Some writers translate it simply as "the powerful One," or "the all-sufficient One."

Miscellaneous

J. B. S., Waupaca, Wis. Please send us your name and address in full and we will write.

S. L. B., Millersburg, Pa. There is no such passage in the Bible. The nearest approach to it is Isa. 57: 2.

E. N., Conway, S. C. The divine mercy is infinite and we have no right to set limits to God's grace. What Jesus taught ought to be accepted by his followers to-day.

Episcopal, New York, N. Y. The matter has been discussed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and if you will send us your full name and address we will be glad to send you a copy of our latest article on the subject.

H. L., New York City. We replied to your inquiry in our February 28 issue, and now a reader in Long Hill, Conn., desires to communicate with you. If this is agreeable to you, we would request that you send your full name and address to the editor of this paper.

Mrs. L. B. K., Philadelphia, Pa. We know of no reason why the person in question should not be a Christian. We are far too apt to judge others, and to condemn faults in them, while forgetting our own shortcomings. That Jesus thought such men were deserving of consideration is evident from the Gospels.

D. B., Concord, N. H. The matter is clearly one which you ought to submit to your pastor. It may be that the other party had a perfect right to do what he did, in which case no step should be taken by you. No one can decide such a matter without knowing all the particulars, and we believe these would be best decided by pastoral advice, guided by prayer.

G. U., Howardstown, Ky. The apostasy of Satan ("adversary" or "opposer") is referred to only in a few passages, viz: Luke 10: 18; II. Pet. 2: 4; Jude 6; Rev. 12: 7, 9; John 8: 44; Matt. 4: 11; Matt. 25: 41; Luke 8: 12; Acts 13: 10; Eph. 6: 11; I. Pet. 5: 8; I. John 3: 8. The passage in Jude is perhaps the most explicit, yet is not altogether clear. I. Tim. 3: 6 tells us that pride was the original cause of the condemnation of Satan. The matter is one far beyond the reach not only of human inquiry, but of speculation, yet theologians have written much on the subject. All practically agree that he was an angel of high estate, who fell through ambition, leading to rebellion.

THE OLD PLEA

He "Didn't Know It Was Loaded."

The coffee drinker seldom realizes that coffee contains the drug, caffeine, a serious poison to the heart and nerves, causing many forms of disease, noticeably dyspepsia.

"I was a lover of coffee and used it for many years and did not realize the bad effects I was suffering from its use. (Tea is just as injurious as coffee because it, too, contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee.)

"At first I was troubled with indigestion. I did not attribute the trouble to the use of coffee, but thought it arose from other causes. With these attacks I had sick headache, nausea and vomiting. Finally my stomach was in such a condition I could scarcely retain any food.

"I consulted a physician; was told all my troubles came from indigestion, but was not informed what caused the indigestion. I kept on with the coffee and kept on with the troubles, too, and my case continued to grow worse from year to year until it developed into chronic diarrhea, nausea and severe attacks of vomiting. I could keep nothing on my stomach and became a mere shadow, reduced from 159 to 128 pounds.

"A specialist informed me I had a very severe case of catarrh of the stomach which had got so bad he could do nothing for me and I became convinced my days were numbered.

"Then I chanced to see an article setting forth the good qualities of Postum and explaining how coffee injures people so I concluded to give Postum a trial. I soon saw the good effects—my headaches were less frequent, nausea and vomiting only came on at long intervals and I was soon a changed man, feeling much better.

"Then I thought I could stand coffee again, but as soon as I tried it my old troubles returned and I again turned to Postum. Would you believe it, I did this three times before I had sense enough to quit coffee for good and keep on with the Postum. I am now a well man with no more headaches, sick stomach or vomiting and have already gained back to 147 pounds." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Liberia's New President

SINCE its independence was established July 26, 1847, Liberia's presidential chair has been occupied by thirteen different persons. The Hon. Daniel Edward Howard, Secretary of the Treasury for eight years, was elected president May, 1911, and he, with Vice President Harmon, was inaugurated January 1, 1912. The inaugural ceremonies, which took place at Monrovia, lasted two days and were unusually interesting. On the first day, the president of the Senate administered the oath of office to the president elect, who then performed the same act for the vice president elect. During the exercises "All Hail, Liberia, Hail!" "The Lone Star Forever," and "Liberia, the Gem of West Africa," were sung. The president, in his inaugural address, made strong recommendations with reference to education, agriculture, internal revenues, the judiciary and the interior policy. Concerning relations with the United States he said: "The great American Government, after a silence, far from forgetting and abandoning the tender infant cast upon the shores of Africa, has come in our hour of danger to assist us on her strong pinions to a nest of safety. If we but follow her example and heed her teaching of economy, thrift and industry, and if we are just in our dealings with men and nations, we shall never escape her vigilant eye, nor cease to be the object of marked manifestation of interest on her part."

President D. E. Howard of Liberia

At the second day's inaugural ceremonies, the native tribes were officially represented for the first time. About five hundred interior chiefs, by invitation from the government and under the leadership of Mr. Dihdwo Twe, arrived in Monrovia. The president, vice president and secretary of state, attired in native costume, met the chiefs in a special inaugural function. Addresses on native affairs were delivered. The hope of the administration is to strengthen the bond between the government and the interior tribes.

President Howard has appointed the following cabinet: secretary of state, C. D. B. King; secretary of the treasury, T. W. Haynes; attorney general, S. A. Ross; postmaster general, Isaac Moort; secretary of the interior, J. J. Morris; secretary of war, W. E. Dennis; superintendent of public instruction, W. B. Payne. Mr. Payne, a member of the Bassa tribe, is the first aborigine to hold office in the cabinet. One senator and three representatives in the present Liberian Congress have sprung from native tribes.

A recent loan not to exceed one and one-half million dollars has been negotiated by the Liberian Government with the help of America, England, France and Germany. The customs at Monrovia have been placed in charge of an American receiver general, aided by three receivers representing the other governments involved. The boundary dispute between France and Liberia has been settled and a satisfactory exchange of territory has been made between Liberia and Sierra Leone. Religious and educational workers will now go forward with lighter hearts because of the brightened outlook for the evangelization of all dwelling within the bounds of the republic of Liberia.

Girlhood and Heroines

great white banner which she herself has designed; womanly, unspoiled, pure as the lilies, by her own enthusiasm and faith she has inspired the soldiers, and together they have won one of the greatest battles of the world. In the following paragraphs she is on the battle-field, out among those who were not triumphant; with cups of cold water soothing and comforting the wounded and dying soldiers, Joan the sweet pitying woman, full of the majesty of a girlish faith in God; and remember, she is not sixteen.

A little further on we come upon her in the great abbey surrounded by courtiers and nobles, the king himself kneeling before her and receiving at her young hands the crown that restored France to its high position among nations. And she such a slip of a girl—radiant, courageous, humble, unspoiled!

But more than all the rest I like the spirited pages where Joan, refusing the proffered honors of the king in return for her priceless service, asks only that the little village of Domremy be released from taxation and that she be allowed to return to her father's house, there to take up where she left them off her homely duties and live the sweet womanly life which with all her heart she prayed for and believed she was meant to fulfil. Ah, if she had only gone home!

Joan of Arc a Suffragist

WOULD Joan of Arc have been a suffragist?" I was asked only this morning while I was writing this paper. I wonder indeed what Joan of Arc would have done had she been offered the privilege to vote. "With courage and patience and clear faith in God, I myself will restore my country to its highest rights and privileges among the nations of the world." This is her answer to such a question. But conditions have changed since the days of Joan of Arc, you remind me. Not so much after all, I am thinking. To be sure, knitting, weaving, sewing, and many of the arts and crafts of housekeeping, have been relegated from the home to the factories, but home-making itself is very much the same old art as it ever was, and many of the heroic qualities of youth are the attributes of the fuller, riper life toward which all gracious girlhood points. I believe there are many girls in the world to-day who have the qualities to do precisely as Joan did. It is by constant transformation into our lives that such girls as Joan of Arc live over and over again, and this is their immortality. We are a part of it, believe me. The message of this "paper" is: While we are believing in and admiring the heroes and heroines that all the world loves, we must not overlook the loveliness that is in our own lives. The same headlong girlish courage that led Joan of Arc can lead us on to unguessed victories over many a zealous girlhood struggle: And if like Joan, when our first fiery battles are won, and we have earned the right to crown our lives with a longing to get home and fulfil the sweet womanly mission that God intends us to perfect —the mission of home-making—then will our girlhood be glorified and we shall discover the divine wisdom which has guided and prepared us for the highest calling of all. For beyond all else the noblest and most perfect sphere of woman is wifehood and motherhood and her own home, where, rounding out her destiny in training and guiding the lives of others, she continues the work that God gave into her hands, and fitted her to do.

Lovingly and faithfully yours,

The Aunt in the Cozy Corner

The Law of Love*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

TO-DAY we sit at the feet of Jesus as he teaches his twelve apostles and the multitude that has gathered upon Kurun Hattin (the Mount of Beatitudes). The Sermon on the Mount is not yet done. It has been said: "We might view it as upward teaching in regard to God, the King; inward teaching in regard to men, the subjects of the King; and outward teaching in regard to the church and the world, the boundaries of the kingdom" (Edersheim). By another it has been said: "It is the love of man he is teaching, not an array of new commandments intended to rival the endless traditions of the scribes" (James Stalker in The Ethics of Jesus). Therefore let us not try to set the Mount of Beatitudes over against Mount Sinai; the atmosphere of one is different from that of the other. On Mount Sinai the law came through Moses, and its note was obedience. On the Mount of Beatitudes the law came through Jesus Christ, and its note was love. When the law was given on Sinai, the whole mountain quaked greatly, and smoke went up from it as the smoke of a furnace, and the people stood round about it, but not near, for they had been told, "Take heed to yourselves, that ye go not up into the mount, or touch the border of it: whosoever toucheth the mount shall be surely put to death" (Ex. 19: 12). In contrast, the people gathered about Jesus as he uttered the law of love on the Mount of Beatitudes. They sat upon cushions of grass and flowers, and the clear air was filled with sunshine and sweet odors.

There are three lessons I would write,
Three words as with a golden pen,
In tracings of eternal light
Upon the hearts of men.

Have hope! Though clouds environ round,
And gladness hides her face in scorn,
Put thou the shadow from thy brow—
No night but has its morn.

Have faith! Where'er thy bark is driven—
The calm's disport, the tempest's mirth—
Know this: God rules the hosts of heaven,
The inhabitants of earth.

Have love! Not love alone for one,
But man as man thy brother call,
And scatter, like the circling sun,
Thy charities on all.

—Author Unknown.

God is everywhere, and therefore religion belongs everywhere. The circle, symbol of completeness, is its fitting type. That circle Moses and Jesus both divide into two hemispheres of love. Love is the all-embracing circle, with God as its object in the one hemisphere and man in the other. Religion is for every individual the art of right relations; first, with the Father of all; second, with our brother man. Right relations with God are first in order and importance. To the hemisphere of right relations with God belongs the Saviourship of Jesus, through whose love, strong as death, we come to love God. To the hemisphere of right relations with man belongs the kingship of Christ, for while the individual is saved by his cross, the community is to be saved by his crown, by making the law of Christ the law of all our associated life—of business and politics and pleasure.

Law Must Rest Upon Love

Thou shalt love God; thou shalt love man; on these two loves hang all the law. God has a wonderful plan in the natural arrangements of society for developing out of individual selfishness a world-wide altruism. Only a few have reached it, but great progress has been made since it was considered almost a duty to hate and fight all

HAVE YOU AN American Flag?

HERE IS AN OPPORUNITY TO SECURE ONE FREE!

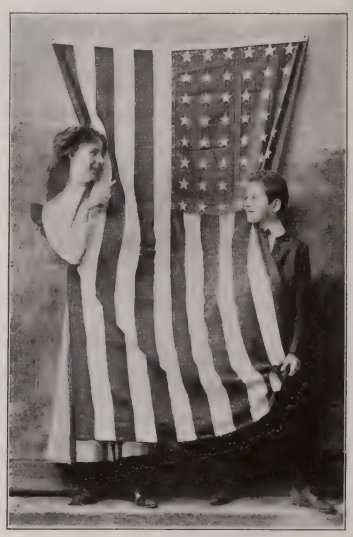
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has just made arrangements whereby it is enabled to offer a large American Flag, like the one in the illustration, to a limited number of its readers, without payment on their part of one cent.

Not a little hand-flag, understand, but a large size "Old Glory" bigger than the top of your dining-room table.

Here is an opportunity to keep faith with your patriotism. You will have use for a flag on every holiday for years to come, and you can also use it constantly for decorative purposes in public and private sociables, in the schoolhouse, in the church, and in the home.

Of course, you want a Flag for Memorial Day.



This is the smaller (4x6 ft.) of the two flags offered. Compare size with the height of the children. The larger flag measures 5x8 feet.

Just think of being able to celebrate Memorial Day, Flag Day, the Fourth of July, with such a flag—real red, white and blue, right from the factory of the government flag-maker.

YOU PAY NO MONEY

At this time of the year THE CHRISTIAN HERALD usually puts forth an extraordinay effort to increase the number of members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. We can only do this with the help of the present members; YOU are one of these, and we know that you will help us. But we have no right to expect your good offices for nothing, so we make you the following offer.

The regular annual subscription price of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as you know, is $1.50. Is not there some one among your relations, friends or acquaintances who you know would be benefited by receiving THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? You can probably think of several in a few minutes, and it would be comparatively easy for you to get them to subscribe for a short trial period—say eight months.

YOUR FRIENDS WILL HELP YOU

Get one of your friends to subscribe to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for eight months, send us only one dollar for this subscription, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be mailed to the address in the United States or Canada furnished by you. In return for your trouble we will send you, absolutely without cost, a beautiful American Flag, and in addition we will send you, also without cost to you, a life-size facsimile of the Declaration of Independence, 26x31 inches—an exact duplicate in every way of the priceless document which was signed by the Fathers of our Country. This document should be in every patriotic home.

The above offer is for the 4x6 foot Flag shown in the illustration. Perhaps you would prefer a larger Flag—5x8 feet in size. To secure this size Flag, send us TWO eight months' subscriptions accompanied by one dollar each, and we will send you this extra size "Old Glory."

NOTE: It is understood that this offer can only be accepted by a subscriber whose name is now on our books, and that the new subscriptions sent in will be for addresses which are not now on our books.

Memorial Day, but a few weeks off, makes our wonderful Flag offer particularly attractive to every loyal American heart, and you should take especial pride in securing one of these Flags for your home. Address foreigners. This plan may be pictured in a series of concentric circles. First the inner, the home circle. Then the circle of neighborhood love, developed by the sympathy of a family for other families close at hand. Then comes the larger circle for one's own town, where patriotism begins. It should, and usually does, extend to some degree of love for one's State. The next circle is the love of country, and patriotism develops. Love for man should not stop with patriotism, but should take account of the interests of other nations, and love for all mankind will be the outermost circle excepting one. The largest circle of all represents the love of God, which is the measure of the world: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." All of the five circles take form because they are bounded by the circle of the love of God.

Love Thy Neighbor as Thyself

When we do thus love, we shall find that we have fulfilled all law, the law of the State as well as the law of God. Love is the fulfilment of the law.

"Poor Love," said Life, "that hast not gold,
Nor lands, nor other store, I ween;
Thy very shelter from the cold
Is oft but lowly built and mean."
"Nay, though of rushes be my bed,
Yet I am rich," Love said.

"But," argued Life, "thrice fond art thou
To yield the sovereign gifts of earth—
The victor sword, the laureled brow—
For visioned things of little worth!"
Love gazed afar with dreamlit eyes,
And answered, "Nay, but wise."

"Yet, Love," said Life, "what can atone
For all the travail of thy years—
The yearnings vain, the vigils lone,
The pain, the sacrifice, the tears?"
Soft as the breath breathed from a rose,
The answer came, "Love knows."
—FLORENCE EARLE COATES.

A gentleman saw a boy thief in his flower garden. He quietly went forth to meet the boy, and in a roundabout way, so that the boy would not see him coming. Suddenly he laid his hand on the boy's shoulder, saying, "Now, my boy, answer me one question: which is the best flower in the garden?"

The boy, finding no escape, looked around, and after a few minutes' pause, said: "That rose is best," as he pointed to a beautiful moss rose.

The gentleman, still keeping one hand on the boy's shoulder, reached out his other hand, and, plucking the rose in all its beauty, gave it to the boy, and, releasing him as he did so, said: "There, take it, my boy."

The boy was amazed. Looking into the face of his strange benefactor, he said, "Ain't you going to have me punished, sir?"

"No," was the reply; "but as I am going to give you the best flower in my garden, you will never steal from my flower-beds again, will you?"

"Never, sir, as long as I live," was the emphatic reply; "but, please, sir, ain't there some little errand I can do for you?"

Free forgiveness and a token of love had won the pardoned boy's heart, and from that hour he was the willing servant of his friend.

Have not we as sinners trampled down God's holy laws, and grieved him many times? How has he treated us? He sent from the throne of glory Jesus his only begotten Son—the "Rose of Sharon"—as a gift to a sinful world.

After a hard summer's toil, Professor John Stuart Blackie went back to the University of Edinburgh, tired and exacting. Students desiring admittance stood in a line before him. "Show your papers," he said. As they obeyed, a highland laddie held his up awkwardly in the left hand. "Hold them up properly in the right hand," said the professor in savage mood. The boy replied somewhat faintly, but still held the papers in his left hand. "The right hand, you loon!" shouted out the professor. "Sir, I hae nae right hand," said the boy, holding up the stub. The class hissed at the professor. But the great man came down from his desk, and threw his arms around the boy, saying, "Eh, laddie, forgive me! I was ower rough. I dinna mean to hurt you, lad, I didna ken." Then to the class he said, "I thank God he has given me gentlemen to teach me when I go astray." Is it a wonder that the boys loved a man that would right a wrong? Is it a wonder that, living or dead, such influence counts for righteousness?

Pray for Them that Despitefully Use You

Stephen is called the first martyr; when he was being stoned to death at Jerusalem by those who were the enemies of Christ, as well as the enemies of Stephen himself, he kneeled down, and with a loud voice cried out, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." Jesus prayed for those who had nailed him to the cross. "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." We must believe that the hardest thing we shall ever have to do is to pray for them that despitefully use us. It can only be done when the heart is full of the love of God. If you cannot pray for your enemy, then pray for more love.

King James II. one day lost some important papers. He hunted for them until he got into a great rage, and then he accused his faithful secretary "Gib" of having lost them. Gib fell on his knees and told the king that surely he had never given them into his care. As he knelt there, the king struck him. Gib rose up, and as he was leaving the presence of the king, he said: "I have always been faithful to your majesty, and I have not deserved such treatment. I cannot remain in your service. I shall never see you again."

Not long afterward the person to whom the king had actually given the papers returned them. Then the king, much ashamed of his treatment of Gib, sent for him. When Gib came into the royal presence the king got down on his knees before him, and said he would not rise until he forgave him. The secretary tried to evade the matter, and begged his master to rise; but he would not, until assured that the insult was fully forgiven. We are all prone to making wrong judgments, sometimes called "snap judgments" of others. Love is the leash by which we can hold ourselves in check in such matters.

He walked for years in ways of righteousness,
Good deeds unnumbered dropping from his hand;
Then, lo, a single sin he must confess,
That bruited was far up and down the land;
And all the people drew a solemn face,
And called him "trickster," whispered his disgrace.

'Twill be a wondrous world, to heaven full nigh,
If ever man whose common life is sin,
Shall do one act of good, whereat a cry
Of "Saint" shall fill the air with ready din;
The people quick forgetting all the past,
And glad to see God's image show at last.

Do You Want "Garden Profits?"

This Is One of the Most Liberal Offers We Have Ever Made To Christian Herald Readers

Read This Description Carefully

"GARDEN PROFITS" is a clothbound, well-illustrated book, which tells in an interesting way what the well-planted garden will do toward making money or saving money for the home. Here is a partial list of contents: "The Self-Supporting Home," "Successful Gardens You Can Have," "How to Make Twenty-four Tomato Plants Hand You Fifty Dollars," "What One Woman Can Do with Ten Dollars," "Five Crops on One Foot of Ground," "Twelve Hundred Per Cent. Profit from 20x27 Feet of Ground."

The Garden Magazine is a beautifully illustrated publication that concerns itself with the "home outdoors," the little garden, the flower beds, with all that makes for beautifying home surroundings, whether in city suburbs or country, and with the possibilities of raising vegetables and fruits to supply one's own household, or even to make a considerable profit at practically no expense.

There are thousands of people who should know about these possibilities, and who would be lifted out of narrow dependence and worry by getting back to nature.

Our arrangement with the Garden Magazine enables any of our readers to take advantage of this opportunity to secure these two magazines at much less than the usual price and in addition to sending you THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for eight months and the Garden Magazine for six months for $1.50, we will send without extra cost to you a clothbound volume entitled "Garden Profits."

To get the full benefit of the ideas contained in this book you should order it NOW.

This offer may also be taken advantage of by any person not now a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family.

We have the right to say Sanatogen will help weak nerves and poor digestion

—The right that is based on the knowledge and the conviction that Sanatogen is worthy of earnest recommendation.

—The right that is based on the unique qualities of Sanatogen itself—on the known fact that it answers the highest scientific requirements.

—The right that is based on the splendid results Sanatogen has accomplished.

—The right that is based on the experience of leading physicians as recorded in medical journals and text books.

—The right that is based on the unexampled endorsement of this remarkable food tonic by over 15,000 practising physicians, who have watched its strengthening, revitalizing influence on their patients.

—The right that is based on thousands upon thousands of enthusiastic letters from distinguished men and women of many lands, who have felt the uplift of its rejuvenating action.

Such is our "right to say"—such is the basis of our sincere conviction that Sanatogen will help those whose nerves have been weakened by overwork, worry or illness—whose digestion and powers of assimilation have become deranged—who have lost their grip on life. In other words we have—

The right that is based on the needs of the nervous system itself.

The right of the nerves—and not least those that directly affect the digestion—is based on the need of nourishment. If the nerves are to perform their functions, if they are to be strong, healthy nerves, they must be fed. If any strain disturbs their natural absorption of food from the daily diet, the nerves suffer all the distresses and reactions of hunger.

Sanatogen is the special food of the nerves in this crisis.

Sanatogen is a scientific combination of the very food elements required by the impoverished nerves and it goes directly to their rescue.

By feeding to the nerves the body elements they need, Sanatogen restores to them their vital balance of natural strength and thus in the most logical way helps to give back to the body the full vigor of health.

Our "right to say" is your assurance of help.

Your nerves have a right to Sanatogen.

Prof. Thos. B. Stillman, M.S., Ph.D.
The well-known research chemist of Stevens Institute, writes:
"The chemical union of the constituents of Sanatogen is a true one, representative of the highest skill in the formation of a product containing phosphorus in the organic phosphate condition, and so combined that digestion and assimilation of Sanatogen are rendered complete with the greatest ease."

"The Lancet" says:
"There is abundant evidence of the value of Sanatogen as a restorative and food, and more particularly in cases of general debility."

John Burroughs
The distinguished naturalist and author, writes:
"I am sure I have been greatly benefited by Sanatogen. My sleep is fifty per cent better than it was one year ago, and my mind and strength much improved."

Prof. C. A. Ewald
of Berlin University, Doctor honoris causa University of Maryland, states in his contribution on "Typhus abdominalis":
"I can say that I have used Sanatogen in a great number of cases (that is, in those disturbances of metabolism which were mainly of a nervous or neurasthenic origin), and have obtained excellent results."

Charles D. Sigsbee
Rear-Admiral, U.S. Navy, writes:
"After a thorough trial of Sanatogen, I am convinced of its merits as a food and tonic. Its beneficial effects are beyond doubt."

Lady Henry Somerset
The prominent social reform advocate, writes:
"Sanatogen undoubtedly restores sleep, invigorates the nerves and braces the patient to health. I have watched its effect on people whose nervous systems have been entirely undermined, and I have proved Sanatogen to be most valuable."

A Remarkable Book FREE upon request

The work of a physician-author, beautifully illustrated, which tells you some really interesting things about your nervous system, facts which vitally affect your well-being and which, therefore you ought to know. This book also tells the story of Sanatogen convincingly from the point of view of a physician, but so that any layman can understand it. Ask for a FREE copy of "Our Nerves of Tomorrow."

The Ocean's Greatest Disaster!

THERE has just been enacted the greatest ocean tragedy the world ever saw—the sinking of the gigantic ocean liner "Titanic" on her maiden voyage. The greatest ship ever built, with her precious cargo of human freight went to the bottom of the ocean a thousand miles from shore amid a wilderness of icebergs. Multi-millionaires, authors, statesmen, and immigrants share the same watery grave. Never before was there such an exhibition of heroism and chivalry. Picture the ship's musicians, ankle deep in the rising flood, trying to soften the anguish of the dying with strains of melody; husbands handing their wives into the lifeboats, while deluding them with false assurances of their own safety. Imagine that noble wife, who, choosing perhaps the happier part, calmly refusing to go and remaining on the doomed ship by her husband's side. See the famous and brilliant men ungrudgingly standing aside for the poor peasant women of the steerage. These heroes of real life bore themselves in a way that leaves the world richer and better for their having lived and died. Here, indeed, is a glorious glimpse of what man can do in a supreme moment. The whole world is afire with sympathy and sorrow and every one who reads must have this permanent pictorial and descriptive record of the greatest ocean disaster in the world's history, the

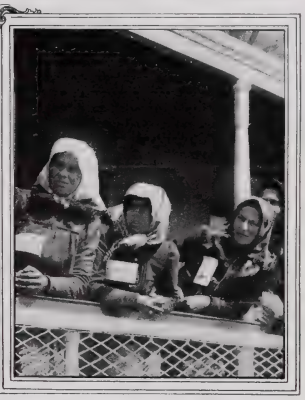
As the Ship Docks, Waiting to Go to Ellis Island

Passed; Ticketed to Their Destinations



CROWDING AT LIBERTY'S GATES

Is the Coming of the Alien Multitude an Acquisition or a National Peril?

THE flood which set in from southern Europe to America a few years ago reached its highest mark during the month that has just closed. It is estimated that over 100,000 foreigners passed through Ellis Island during the month. April of last year tested the capacity of the department, when 83,675 aliens were passed through the routine of inspection and acceptance; so it is not difficult to imagine what has taken place recently. The conditions this year have been such as to cause Commissioner Williams, who is in charge of the government station which handles the immigrants coming into New York, a great deal of uneasiness. He has had no hesitation recently in stating that the government's facilities for the examination and care of the newcomers is entirely inadequate. It was publicly stated not long since that at Ellis Island it is impossible to properly examine the large number of immigrants who now pass through those portals to our country, and as a result a gross injury is being inflicted upon the health of the nation. There is no doubt that for the most part the immigrants come from the unhealthy parts of southern Europe and carry contagious diseases. Many are weak-minded, a condition which in their hurried examination it is often very difficult to detect. This is specially true in the case of young children, who are sent to this country, in many cases, it is believed, simply because they can receive better care in American institutions. Commissioner Williams said only a few days ago that conditions were sadly in need of improvement at Ellis Island. He said it was simply impossible to care for the large numbers coming in during this, the height of the rush season. Mr. Williams said, "We are up against it here, but the strictest sort of an investigation will prove that we are doing the very best we can in the circumstances. We handle every immigrant with reasonable care, but when they pour in on us as they have in the last few weeks, of course the physicians have to hurry through with their inspection. No one is more interested than I in making a thorough examination of each individual. But what are we going to do? Already we have had complaints about the use of three-tier cots, and that is the only manner in which we are able to care for 18,000 each night." When almost twice that number arrive, as was the case last month, and the authorities are obliged to rush them through, aliens who would naturally and quite reasonably be detained until a complete examination could be made, not only to ascertain their physical condition but also to learn the conditions surrounding their emigration, are permitted to enter New York City.

Dr. George B. Campbell, head of the New York State Commission on Deportation, has stated:

"The class that gains admission to this country when the rigidity of inspection is relaxed is the most dangerous to our national health. The feeble-minded and the epileptics and the defectives whose condition requires more than superficial examination for discovery are the ones who slip into the United States in times of relaxed inspection. They are the greatest menace to the health and morals of the community.

"New York must take the lead in fighting the foreign defective. New York gets him first and keeps him longest. There are 32,000 insane persons in New York State hospitals. Thirteen thousand of these are alien born. There is one insane to every fifty sane aliens in this State. There is one insane to every two hundred and fifty sane native born. If we could return to their native lands all our alien-born insane who were insane when they arrived, or suffering then from ailments which produced their insanity, the proportion of insane might be nearly equal in our native and alien-born populations.

"It is impossible to become in the least degree familiar with immigration problems and not realize the deliberate and constant effort of foreign governments to encourage the migration to America of their own undesirables. There is a connection constantly suggested between this and the subsidies granted to transatlantic steamship lines by foreign governments. All are encouraged to migrate to America, but no defectives are permitted to return who can by any device be prevented from so doing.

"Commissioner Williams has the cordial support of the New York State departments that have official relations with him. His administration is generally regarded as one of the most efficient that the Federal immigration service has ever seen, but he is seriously handicapped. There is lack of room at Ellis Island, the corps of officials is numerically insufficient, and this applies especially to the medical examiners. When several steamships come together and the rush is on to get the immigrants through Ellis Island the medical officers there have to inspect 150 persons every five minutes to keep the gangway clear and avert chaotic congestion. Adequate inspection for elimination of the unfit is impossible in those conditions."

It should be possible that very thorough investigation could be made before many of the questionable persons are allowed to come ashore. One of the first places that a visitor to the Island sees is a great room filled with parallel benches, at the end of each one of which there sits an examiner and an interpreter. Looking on this floor from a gallery, one sees the immigrants present themselves for their first inspection under the law. With amazing rapidity the long lines of baggage-laden men and women make their way to the desks, show their papers and their money, and after a few questions are allowed to pass on. Less than an hour later, those who were nervously presenting themselves for admission have passed through the entire routine, and are aboard the ferry-boat to be landed at the Battery.

A Scene in the Women's Detention Ward at the Ellis Island Station

Shrewd as the examiners must be to hold their positions, they find themselves with the quickest of quick wits to work against, for it is generally admitted that during the rush seasons attempts are made to force through as many of the undesirables as possible. It has even been stated that the mentally deficient and physically unfit are coached in the perfunctory examination through which they must pass, so that they may answer correctly the first questions put to them, and get away without arousing suspicion. One official at Ellis Island said: "The immigrants coming to this country, especially from the south of Europe, are not the dull, ignorant people they are commonly supposed to be. They are smart, and for the most part clever in their attempts to dupe the immigration officials. There is so much faking among them that it is often difficult to arrive at the truth.

"We have found that many aged men and women, who come here ostensibly to join their sons and daughters, come for no other reason than to enter some American charitable institution for the remainder of their lives. They have no children here, but through agents get other persons to pose as their children until they pass the authorities. We naturally pass them on, as we have no means to detain them until a proper investigation is made."

Another said: "Why, only last week we had a group in here from the Middle West—yes, in fact some of them all the way from Seattle—nearly a round dozen of them diseased and incompetent. All of them have gotten through, probably, at some rush season and had to be brought back at the government's expense."

Dr. Campbell's statement in this connection is interesting.

"New York is the first and greatest sufferer by any break in the barriers Congress has erected to exclude from America the diseased, insane and defective of other countries.

"The tide of immigration sweeps into and through New York the able-bodied aliens, who distribute themselves to their own and the country's advantage all over the various States. The weaklings lag and few ever get beyond New York.

"In the early days the immigrant had to be an able-bodied, hardy person to survive the hardships of coming to this country, and when he arrived he had to shift for himself. Not so now. The increased care and comfort for the immigrant has encouraged the weaklings to emigrate to America. Warm-hearted benevolence is exhibited by a thousand societies for the protection of the very class which would not be admitted if the recruiting of an industrial army were the guiding principle of our immigration policy."

RELIGIOUS TRAINING FOR CHILDREN

THE writer of the recent article on "Training the Heart and Conscience," which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has made a splendid plea for the systematic instruction of our boys and girls in matters that concern God and righteousness. To teach them everything else from A, B, C to cube root in a painstaking and systematic way, and give a secondary place to strengthening the moral stamina—without which secular accomplishments are simply tools that may be employed in a direction antagonistic to the best interests of the individual and society at large—is, indeed, an undertaking that is irreconcilable with the position of professing Christians.

One thing is needful—there are many things valuable, but just one needful. A Christian, who is such not merely in name, has no doubts about what that one thing is. Christian parents are theoretically unanimous that to neglect the moral and religious training of the child which has come into our home is inconsistent with our avowal that there is just one all-important thing in all the world; indeed, they agree that such neglect is fraught with dire consequences. Yet we need a reminder such as is given by the Rev. Richard Braunstein in the article alluded to, which is really worth reprinting.

But how is this training to be done? Parents come in first for consideration. Does the little the parents can do meet the demands of the case? Many parents there are who feel their responsibility. They appreciate that to make a living is important, but to make a life is still more important. However, in the stress and swirl of the hurried days and the insistence of vocation, they can hardly find the time and leisure for systematic work on these lines, and many lack the ability. Then there is the Sunday school. Yes; and it is the only religious instruction some children get. But what idea of the importance if the matter will be raised in the mind of the child who receives systematic instruction in secular studies for five or six hours five days in the week, and hears religious matters discussed just once during this period? The study of the Word of God is crowded into one corner of the week. Thirty hours for secular studies and one hour, or rather thirty to forty minutes if the opening and closing exercises be deducted—one hour, let it be, for the study of religious truths, which are revealed truths, unknown to natural man. The sense of proportion is disturbed by such an arrangement.

About a year ago, I spent some time at the Child Welfare Exhibit. There I saw—I couldn't help seeing it—a large placard with the superscription: "A Short-Weight Education." Then: "Thirty minutes a week for religious instruction in Protestant churches. Instruction in mathematics offered in elementary and high schools, 1,067 hours, equivalent in time to 41 years of Sunday-school instruction. Instruction in writing, 364 hours, equivalent to 14 years of Sunday-school instruction." Then followed in large, bold lettering, "What Is to Be Done?" With regard to Sunday school, we cannot forget that even with all the zeal our workers show, they themselves often lack the training that we require of our secular instructors.

Can we look for help to our public schools? They are maintained by a general tax. All taxpayers, therefore, must have equal rights. What form of religion should there be taught? Immediately the warring factions are upon us. Jews, agnostics, Protestants and Romanists all have before our law equal standing, and there surely cannot be religious coercion of a minority. If anything is un-American that certainly is. The equality of all religious beliefs is also evidenced by the fact that there are teachers in our public schools of all shades of belief and unbelief. There is not and cannot be any religious test. But as a father, I want to know under whose guidance my boy is during the greater part of his waking hours. Some urge that we should let our public school teachers preach a creedless religion and morality; but as soon as you make a statement concerning God and righteousness, in fact, any manner of statement, you are voicing a creed. "I have no creed," said a woman, and thereby uttered the shortest of all creeds.

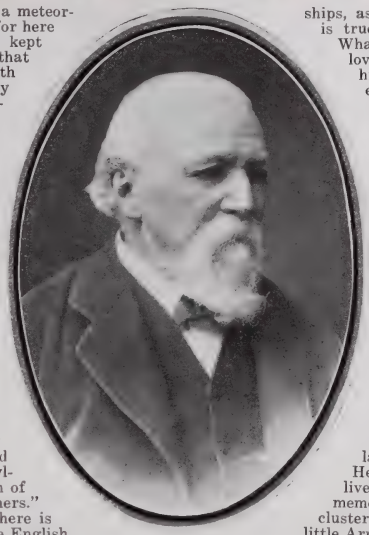
The one deduction that came to me after reading Rev. Mr. Braunstein's forceful article was that under present conditions the only solution is found in the Church school. There seems to be no other way of giving our children, in the way of education, not only a lunch, but a dinner, a full-weight education! In my city, there is such a school with twelve teachers and a building worth $20,000, maintained by our Holland friends of the Christian Reformed Church, the same denomination which responded so nobly to the plea for the China Famine Fund. The Episcopalians at some places also have such schools. The Lutherans have a still greater number—thousands of them throughout the land. A unique feature of the Lutheran schools is this: that about 80 per cent. of the teachers are men who have made teaching their life-work. The children of these schools have all the secular instruction that is afforded in the public schools, and in addition, the study of the Word of God; and all instruction throughout the day is permeated by an avowed Christian spirit. I am acquainted with such a Lutheran school in this city, where, because the congregation is not rich in worldly goods, the building is very unpretentious, but where the results of the work of the two male teachers are simply grand, the scholars upon graduation entering the public high school without further examination and where they easily rank with the best in their classes. The parents who send their children to this school say, "We know that they can get instruction at other schools; but our children, God bless them! ought not to be exposed to instruction that is totally divorced from the Word of God. Give them the best possible preparation for their citizenship in this world and the next! For a complete education, let there be a union of religious and secular work."

What a blessing it would be for the church and the state as well as for the individual, if, from the time when our children grapple with the intricacies of the A, B, C to the days when questions of Greek syntax and the fourth dimension loom up, they would be under the guarding and guiding influence of the Word of God and Christian inspiration!

Paterson, N. J. WALTER KOENIG.

THE BROWNING CENTENNIAL

IT WOULD appear that geniuses rained down like a meteor-shower at the beginning of the nineteenth century, for here at the beginning of the twentieth we have been kept rather busy celebrating centennials. Now comes that of Robert Browning, born May 7, 1812. His hundredth birthday yesterday was celebrated much more quietly than that of some of the other great men so far commemorated. There have been, probably, less of popular interest and enthusiasm over it. But just the same, Browning is a man to whom people who do not know or even do not like his verse, people, in fact, who do not care for poetry at all, owe a debt that cannot be calculated. What it has meant to the nineteenth and twentieth centuries that Robert Browning kept true to the old faith can never be conjectured. There were a few terrible months, possibly years, in his extreme youth when he was in danger of becoming a skeptic. He got Shelley's blasphemous "Queen Mab," and was attracted by its workmanship, and really moved by its message. He also read the works of other unbelievers but came out whole, regretting the grief he had caused his mother during the anxious years. The experience, dangerous and painful as it was, helped to give him an even better equipment than he could otherwise have had for his high task of sounding the true note of faith to the world. Browning and Tennyson labored side by side in England and sang together the note of faith at a time when great teachers and many writers were spreading unbelief. Both these poets had a share that can never be duly estimated and acknowledged in keeping the English and American civilization of the nineteenth century true to the "faith of our fathers."



Robert Browning

Browning has been called "the preacher's poet." There is more real theology in his works than in any other of the English poets, with the possible exception of Milton. But he has a spontaneity, a passion, a lyric beauty which makes it impossible to compare him with Milton in any other respect than his deep religious conviction and strong religious feeling. True, Milton has a few passages of real lyric beauty, and Browning has vast tracts of heavy, lumbering ultra-philosophical verse. But Browning was a real singer; Milton a sacred historian and legendist. Browning has inspired and strengthened many preachers at their task; he was himself a preacher in the best sense, not of teaching but of announcing gladly what he experienced in knowing and enjoying God, of declaring that God is beautiful and good.

But one does not need to be a preacher, or even a student, to enjoy Browning. Many of his poems are extremely difficult; there are difficult passages in many otherwise simple poems. But so are there difficult passages in the Bible. This does not prevent the earnest seeker after truth and beauty from browsing about till he finds some bit of perfume or some sweet and wholesome morsel of soul food. Religion does not need mighty thinking or wide observation.

To perceive him hath gained an abyss where a dew-drop was asked.
I but open my eyes, and perfection, no more and no less,
In the kind I imagined, full-fronts me, and God is seen God
In the star, in the stone, in the flesh, in the soul and the clod.
And thus looking within and around me, I ever renew
(With that stoop of the soul which in bending upraises it too)
The submission of man's nothing-perfect to God's all-complete,
As by each new obeisance in spirit I climb to his feet.

Critics of Browning object to the fact that most of his themes are taken from long-ago times, that he does not deal with modern matters. He certainly loved old stories as he loved old books. But the emotions he touches are the fundamental emotions, and his ideals are the eternal ideals. Not all his verse is satisfactory here. In some poems the mirror is held up steadily, revealing life simply as it is, with no suggestion that it should be different; some moral problems are handled in a fashion hardly satisfactory to the modern religious consciousness. But in the foundation of human relationships, as in the foundation of religious experience, Browning is true. And he is true, for he understood what love is. Whatever Browning may have believed and known about love before he met Elizabeth Barrett, it is certain that his high and powerful interpretation of this great human emotion and experience had its real source in his affection for her. The love of these two poets is one of the most beautiful romances of history. What Beatrice was to Dante, Laura to Petrarch, this gentle lady was to Robert Browning, inspiring, steadying, illuminating, strengthening him. Unlike these poets and many others, however, the course of true love ran smoothly in Browning's life, and aside from the illness of his lady and the stern, unreasonable opposition of her irascible father to their marriage, there were no bitter drops in the wine of their romance. As love deepened health returned, and the two poet lovers, mature and capable, took matters into their own hands, arranged an innocent elopement, and, without succeeding in reconciling the frail bride's father, turned their faces toward Italy. The British people are a little sorry that Browning ever wrote the lines which the proud Venetians have engraved in the tablet to his memory at the Palazzo Rezzonico, where he died:

Open my heart and you shall see
Graven inside of it, Italy.

But it is easy to understand why the poet loved the land that was for so many years his adopted country. Here his wife's delicate health grew stronger; here they lived and loved and toiled together. In Florence, with memories of Dante and Michael Angelo and Savonarola clustered thick about them, on the banks of the bewitching little Arno, in the wilderness of the great and the humbler paintings of Pitti Palace and the Ufizzi Gallery, they dwelt, knowing a few choice friends, receiving admirers and acquaintances on Italian tours, watching with tense interest the struggle of the people for liberty and a united Italy, welcoming the son, who was to cheer their years and become an artist, loving Italian scenes as well as they. The visitor to Florence to-day, wandering among the scenes that recall Angelo and Dante, Savonarola and Galileo, immersed in the memories of rare old days when religion and science and architecture and sculpture and painting and poetry were being brought to a new life to pave the way for a new civilization, lingers reverently at Casa Guidi, where the Brownings lived, loving and sharing the glories of the past while they sent forth their tender and noble message for the inspiration and enlightenment of the new age.

Casa Guidi, from the Pitti Palace

Of the many elements and phases of Browning's character and life which entered into his work there is space to speak only of the charming home life of his early days. His father and mother, cultured and devout, though by no means rich, surrounded his life with everything that would tend to develop his genius, and bore the burden of his support, even after he reached manhood and began his work. His father advanced the money which brought out the earlier editions of his poems, and continued to aid him until his literary work began to bring larger returns. So far from being made weak and irresponsible by these services, Browning grew constantly stronger and more virile. There was none of the delicate airiness about him which poets and near-poets often ape. He was a vigorous, straightforward man who believed that he could best serve the world by writing poems. His parents encouraged him to write, and their love, which he ardently returned, made another source of his fruitful inspiration.

For sheer beauty of feeling and workmanship "Love Among the Ruins," "By the Fireside," "Andrea del Sarto," "One Word More" and "The Guardian Angel" are among the most charming of Browning's poems. "Columbe's Birthday" and the chapters of Caponsacchi and Pompilia in "The Ring and the Book" reach the highest levels of his philosophy of love. "Saul," "An Epistle," "Abt Vogler" and "Rabbi Ben Ezra" reveal at its best his religious belief.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—"SYNDICALISM" IS A NEW term which has lately come into use in connection with the labor strikes abroad. It is derived from syndicat, used by the French in describing an extreme phase of trade unionism. Syndicalists are the revolutionary unionists of the Continent, who employ the general strike as their principal weapon, making it a positive and aggressive movement and not merely a quiescent stoppage of labor. The Syndicalists teach the seizure of the means of production and are antagonistic to the existing State authority. Their movement has had its rise and development chiefly in the Latin countries of Europe.

—THOUGH IT WAS CONSIDERED that the greatest danger from the Mississippi had already passed when the flood stages from the more northern States were reported over, a great deal of destruction has been caused by the breaking of the dikes and flooding of great stretches of territory along the lower waters of the river. Advices to Governor Earl Brewer of Mississippi stated a few days ago that there were over 6,000 refugees in camp at Cleveland and that the food supply was only sufficient for twenty-four hours. The greatest destruction as well as the greatest loss of life has been reported from Bolivar County, Miss. It was stated in Jackson that two hundred persons had been drowned by the flood that swept through that section when the levees broke near Beulah, Bolivar County. Into New Orleans for several days came reports from inundated sections of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, telling of the destruction there and of the imperative need of food, clothing, medicine, and other supplies for the thousands of homeless persons. It is believed that delegations from six of the Mississippi States are striving to induce the Rivers and Harbors Committeemen to be their guests on a cruise from Cairo to New Orleans while the Mississippi River is at its worst. The object is to obtain Federal emergency legislation for flood protection.

—DESPATCHES FROM A NUMBER of Middle Western cities stated on April 21 that a series of destructive and fatal tornadoes had swept over a very extensive section of the country. Perry, Okla., reported that two children had been killed there and more than one hundred wooden buildings had been blown over. A Chicago despatch said thirty-two persons are known to be dead, half a score were so severely injured that they may die, and fifty others were hurt in two tornadoes, one of which swept over southern Illinois and the other across northern Illinois into Indiana late last night. A number of other Illinois cities reported deaths from the tornadoes and from Kentland, Ind., and Kansas City, Mo., have come reports of about twelve deaths and the destruction of thousands of dollars worth of property. It is estimated that the damage in the State of Kansas alone aggregated about $200,000.

—ABDUL BAHA ABBAS, the leader of the Bahai movement "for the unification of all religions and the establishment of universal peace," is visiting the United States. He speaks in Persian, which an interpreter explains to the audiences. At a recent meeting in the Church of the Ascension, New York, he said among other things: "Jesus Christ came to this world that the people might have through him a spirit of oneness with God. There must be a oneness of the world with humanity. When this takes place then will we have the "most great peace." To-day the body politic is indeed for the oneness of the world—for universal peace. But they require a certain propelling power to spread the feeling and to firmly plant it in the minds of men. I find a strong movement for universal peace emanating from America. It is my hope that here in the Occident the foundation of this new solidarity may be strengthened and that the Orient and the Occident will be cemented together; that there may be a real unity, so that this world may at last find peace. May the hearts of men become as brothers."

The World's Need of Patience

TEXT: "Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it. Be ye also patient, for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh." James 5: 7, 8.

FOR all lovers of their kind, nothing is so hard to bear as the slowness of the upward progress of society. It is not simply that the rise of the common people is accompanied with heavy wastes and losses; it is that the upward movement is along lines so vast as to make society's growth seem tardy, delayed, or even reversed. Doubtless the drift of the ages is upward, but this progress becomes apparent only when age is compared with age, and century with century. It is not easy for some Bruno or Wyclif, sowing the good seed of liberty and toleration in one century, to know that not until another century hath passed will the precious harvest be reaped. Man is accustomed to brief intervals. Not long the space between January's snowdrifts and June's red berries, brief the interval between the egg and the eagle's full flight. Scarcely a score of years separate the infant of days from the youth of full stature. Trained to expect the April seed to stand close beside the August sheaf, it is not easy for man to accustom himself to the processes of Him with whom fourscore years are but a handbreadth, and a thousand years as but one day.

To man, therefore, toiling upon his industry, his art, his government, his religion, comes this reflection: Because the divine epochs are long, let not the patriot or parent be sick with hope long deferred. Let the reformer sow his seed, untroubled when the sickle rusts in the hand that waits for its harvest. Remember that as things go up in value, the period between the inception and fruition is protracted. Because the plant is low, the days between seed and sheaf are few and short; because the bird is higher, months stand between egg and eagle; but manhood is a thing so high, culture and character are harvests so rich, as to ask years and even ages for ripening; while God's purposes for society involve such treasures of art, wisdom, wealth, law, liberty, as to ask eons and cycles for their full perfection. Therefore, let each patriot and sage, each reformer and teacher be patient. The world itself is a seed. Not until ages have passed shall it burst into bloom and blossom.

Life Delays Its Gifts

Troubled by the strifes of society, depressed by the waste of its forces and the delays of its columns, he who seeks character for himself and progress for his kind oft needs to shelter himself beneath the divine principle called the time-element for the individual and the race. Optimists are we; our world is a good world, joys are more than sorrows, wastes shall yet become savings, and defeats victories; nevertheless, life's woes, wrongs and delays are such as to give man pause. The multitudes hunger for power and influence, hunger for wealth and wisdom, for happiness and comfort; satisfaction seems denied them. What delays also in justice! What recognition does society withhold from its heroes! What praise spoken above the pulseless corpse that is denied the living hungering heart! What gold coin spent for the marble wreath by those who have no copper for laurel for the living hero! How do rewards that dazzle in prospect, in possession burst like gaudy bubbles! Honors are evanescent; reputation is a vapor; property takes wings; possessions counted firm as adamant dissolve like painted clouds; in the hour of depression the hand drops its tool, the heart its task. In such dark hours and moods, strong men reflect that he who sows the good seed of liberty or culture or character must have long patience until the harvest; that as things go up in value they ask for longer time; that he is the true hero who redeems himself out of present defeat by the foresight of far-off and future victory; that man has a patent of nobility from God himself who can lay out his life upon the principle that a thousand years are as one day. The truly great man takes long steps by God's side, has the courage of the future; working, he can also wait.

The time principle holds in man's social and industrial life. To-day our colleges have their anthropological departments and our cities their museums. The comparative study of the dress, weapons, tools, houses, ships of savage and civilized races gives an outline view of the progress of society. How fragile and rude the handiwork of savages! How quickly are the wants provided for! A few fig-leaves make a full suit for the African, and the skin of an ox his garb for the winter. But the civilized man must toil long upon his loom for his garments of wool and fine silk. Slowly the hollow log journeys toward the ocean steamer; slowly the forked stick gives place to the steam plow, the slow ox to the swift engine; slowly the sea-shell, with three strings tied across its mouth, develops into the many-mouthed pipe-organ. But if rude and low conveniences represent little time and toil, these later inventions represent centuries of arduous labor. In his history of the German tribes, Tacitus gives us a picture of a day's toil for one of the forest children. Moving to the banks of some new stream, the rude man peels the bark; with a club he beats down the nuts from the branches; with a pound stone he knocks the squirrels from the bough; another hour suffices for cutting a line from the ox's hide; and hastily making a hook out of the wishbone of the bird he draws the trout from its stream. But if for the savage race a day suffices for building and provisioning the tent, the accumulated wisdom of centuries is required for the home of to-day. One century offers an arch for the door, another century offers glass windows, another offers wrought nails and hinges, another plaster that will receive and hold the warm colors, another offers the marble, tapestry, picture, and piano, the thousand conveniences for use and beauty. Thus many hands have toiled upon man's house, man's art, industry, invention.

Working and Waiting in Religion

With long patience also man has worked and waited as he has toiled upon his idea of religion. Rude, indeed, man's hasty thoughts of the Infinite. In early days the sun was God's eye, the thunder his voice, the stroke of the earthquake the stroke of his arm, the harvest indicated his pleasure, the pestilence his anger. In such an age the priest and philosopher taxed their genius to invent methods of preserving the friendship and avoiding the anger of the Infinite. Daily the king and general calculated how many sheep and oxen they must slay to avoid defeat in battle. Daily the husbandman and farmer calculated how many doves and lambs must be killed to avert blight from the vineyard and hailstorms from the harvests. Observing that when the king ascended to the throne the slaves put their necks under his heel and covered their bodies with dust, in their haste the priests concluded that by degrading man God would be exalted. Prostrating themselves in dirt and rags, men went down in order that by contrast the throne of God might rise. The mud was made thick upon man's brow that the crown upon the brow of God might be made brilliant. Out of this degrading thought grew the idea that God lived and ruled for his own gratification and self-glory. The infinite throne was unveiled as the throne of infinite self-aggrandizement. Slowly it was perceived that the parent who makes all things move about himself as a center, ever monopolizing the best food, the best place, the best things, at last becomes a monster of selfishness and suffers an awful degradation, while he who sacrifices himself for others is the true hero. But at last Christ entered the earthly scene with his Golden Rule and his new commandment of love. He unveiled God not as desiring to be ministered to, but as ministering; as being rich, yet for man's sake becoming poor; as asking little, but giving much; as caring for the sparrow and lily; as waiting upon each beetle, bird, and beast, and caring for each detail of man's life. Slowly the word God increased in richness. Having found through his telescope worlds so distant as to involve infinite power, man emptied the idea of omnipotence into the word God; finding an infinite wisdom in the wealth of the summers and winters, man added the idea of omniscience; noting a certain upward tendency in society, man added the word providence; gladdened by God's mercy, man added ideas of forgiveness and love. Slowly the word grew. In the olden time people entering the Acropolis cast their gifts of gold and silver into some vase. Last of all came the prince, who emptied in jewels and flashing gems, and made the vase to overflow. Not otherwise Christ emptied vast wealth of meaning into the words called conscience, law, love, vicarious suffering, immortality, God. Beautiful, indeed, the simplicity of Christ. But, with long patience, man waited for the unveiling of the face of love.

History of Social Progress

To all patriots and Christian men who seek to use occupation and profession so as to promote the world's upward growth comes the reflection that henceforth society's progress must be slow, because its institutions are high and complex. To-day many look into the future with shaded eyes of terror. In the social unrest and discontent of our times timid men see the brewing of a social and industrial storm. In their alarm, amateur reformers bring in social panaceas, conceived in haste and born in fear. But God cannot be hurried. His century-plants cannot be forced to blossom in a night. No reformer can be too zealous for man's progress, but he can be too impatient. In these days, when civilization has become complex and the fruitage high, those who work must also wait, and with patience endure. Multitudes are abroad trying to settle the labor problem. The labor problem will never be settled until the last man lies in the graveyard. Each new inventor reopens the labor problem. Men were contented with their wages until Gutenberg invented his type and made books possible; then straightway every laborer asked an increased wage, that though he died ignorant, his children might be intelligent. When society had readjusted things and man had obtained the larger wage, Arkwright came, inventing his new loom, Goodyear came with the use of rubber, and straightway men asked a new wage, to advantage themselves of woolen garments, rubber goods for miners and sailors.

Intelligence is emancipating man. Ignorance is a constant invitation to oppression. So long as workmen are ignorant governments will oppress them; wealth will oppress them; religious machinery will oppress them. But education can make man's risk too large to be holden of fetters. In the autumn the forest trees tighten the bark, but when April's sap runs through the trees, the trunk swells, the bark is strained, and despite all protests, it splits and cracks. But the splitting of the bark saves the life of the tree. The soft, balmy air of April is passing over the world, and succeeding to the winter of man's discontent. Old ideas are being rent asunder, and old institutions are being succeeded by new ones. God is abroad, destroying that he may save. In every age he makes the discontent of the present to be the prophecy of the higher civilization. Despite all the pessimists and the croakers, the ideas of manhood were never so high as to-day, and the number of those whose hearts are knitted in with their kind was never so large or so noble. The movement may be slow, but it is because the social organs are complex and intricate. With long patience man must work and also wait.

In the world of business, also, the time-element exerts striking influence. To-day our land is filled with men who have sown the seed of thought and purpose, but whose harvest is of so high a quality that with long patience must they wait for the fruition. The condition of our land as to the overthrow of its leaders answers to the condition in Hungary when Kossuth and his fellow patriots, accustomed to life's comforts and its luxuries, went forth penniless exiles to accustom themselves to menial toil, to hardship and extreme poverty. His heart must be of iron who could behold these who have been leaders of the industrial column, who now stand aside and see the multitudes sweep by. Just at the moment of expected victory misfortune overtook them and brought their structure down in ruins. And because the seed they have sown is not physical, but mental and moral, the fruition is long postponed. These whose harvest is delayed are a great company. Elizabeth Barrett Browning, exclaiming, "I have not used half the powers God has given me"; Arthur Clough, dying ere the day was half done;

MY CHRIST

HOW shall my lips or words express
The wealth of love my Christ bestows?
He found my soul in helplessness,
My utmost need he fully knows.

He lifts me up from deep distress,
He leads me through the darkest night;
He breathes such words of tenderness,
My doubts and fears soon take their flight.

He brought me to the fountains sweet,
To drink of their refreshing streams;
He makes my joy in him complete,
Surpassing all my fondest dreams.

He charms me as the morning star,
He is the sunrise in my soul;
And he the light that gleams afar,
Beyond life's race, its shining goal.

Such boundless grace, such depth of love,
Are like a vast unmeasured sea;
Eternity alone will prove
All that my Christ can be to me.

the inventors and reformers, denied their ideals; obscure and humble workmen; the mechanic who emancipates man by his machine; the artisan whose conveniences are endless benefactions to our homes: the smith, whose honest anchor holds the ship in time of storm—all these labored and died without seeing the fruitage; but other men entered into their labors.

To parents who have passed through all the thunder of life's battle, and stand at the close of life's day, discouraged because children are unripe, thoughtless, and immature; to publicists and teachers sowing God's precious seed, but denied its harvests; to individuals, seeking to perfect their character within themselves, comes this thought: that character is a harvest so rich as to ask for long waiting and the courage of far-off results. Nature can perfect physical processes in twenty years, but long time is asked for teaching the arm skill, the tongue its grace of speech, to clothe reason with sweetness and light, to cast error out of the judgment, to teach the will hardness, and the heart hope and endurance. Four hundred years passed by before the capstone was placed upon the cathedral of Cologne, but no trouble requires such patient toil as the structure of manhood. For complexity and beauty, nothing is comparable to character. Great artists spend years upon a single picture. With a touch here and a touch there they approach it, and when a long period has passed they bring it to completion. But all the beauty of paintings, all the grace of statues, all the grandeur of cathedrals are as nothing compared to the painting of that inner picture, the chiseling of that inner manhood, the adornment of that inner temple, that is scarcely begun when the physical life ends. How majestic the full disclosure of an ideal manhood! With what patience must man wait for its completion! Here lies the hope of immortality. It doth not yet appear what man shall be.

May toleration and charity be our portion. May justice, generosity, and sympathy be our gifts. May commerce and character be united in our children and crown them also with leadership. May the time speedily come when it shall be the ambition of all our citizens to put honor and honesty into trade, patriotism into politics, ethics into laws, equality into institutions, and to build a wall of triple brass about the institutions of our fathers. Soon may our city become indeed the city beautiful, all its daughters Christian, all its sons patriots, and the sons of God.

Could Not Do Without The Christian Herald

I see by this week's paper that Mr. Arthur Boyle, of Hamilton, Ontario, has been a subscriber of your paper for eighteen years. That is quite a while; but I am glad to state that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been coming to our family for more than twenty years, and we want it to keep on coming. It is too good a paper to be without, and we would not know how to get along without it.

MOTHER

By Eugene Thwing

SOMEWHERE behind every noble and beautiful work is the influence of a mother. The halls of fame are crowded with proud names of men who have won the world's praise and gratitude for their services and achievements, but if their true testimony were taken it would be found, in most cases, to be like that of Lincoln, who said, "All I am, or hope to be, I owe to my angel mother."

It is most natural and fitting that "Mother's Day" is rapidly taking its place throughout the nation as a sacred day for loving tribute and memorial to motherhood in general and to all good mothers in particular. The second Sunday in May is observed for this purpose. Special offerings of love are tendered to the mother in our homes, and her favorite flower is worn as a mark of honor. If mother has gone on ahead to the "home over there," then the tributes of love are paid in her name to some lonely, sorrowing, or needy mother who is sought out on Mother's Day that she may be made glad for at least one bright moment.

There are strong sons and daughters all through this land, and in other lands, doing the work of the world, carrying on aggressively its reforms, conquering its evil with good, advancing its civilization, carrying the blessings of purer, nobler, kindlier living into the dark slums of our cities and into the remote corners of the earth. These sons and daughters trace the source of their power back to a mother's heart and a mother's life, and they will gladly join in the universal tribute this year on the twelfth of May.

CHINA is undergoing a revolution more remarkable than the clash of rival dynasties. The fight is against opium, and it is sweeping on to victory. Rev. Edward W. Thwing, General Secretary of the International Reform Bureau for the whole of China and Japan, is going up and down, in and out, through China, interviewing city officials and princes of the nation, speaking at native mass-meetings, using several dialects as fluently as a native, writing for scores of newspapers, printing bulletins and colored postcards, sowing literature broadcast, and carrying everywhere an aggressive, enthusiastic and tactful personality. His campaign is winning remarkable results. The new president of the Chinese Republic has appointed him official advisor of the Government Anti-Opium Bureau, and the time of China's freedom from the opium curse is drawing near.

All this began in a mother's heart and a mother's example. This indefatigable worker for the emancipation of China writes: "The memories of my dear mother are very sweet to me as I go about my work here in China. My first thought of work among these people was from my mother. She led me into the work at home, and we came together on the first journey to China. Now, as I am sitting in a little Chinese boat on the North River, I like to look back to the first journey in the country with mother. At every stage she displayed her love and self-denying spirit by the zeal with which she worked among these people she so loved. Her prayers, so earnest and trustful, her loving words of counsel and encouragement, will always be a help and inspiration to me as long as I work among the people she so longed to win to her Saviour.

"Her wish to spend the rest of her life in China was granted. Her last prayer was that she might be useful in the Master's service, and yet that ever his will be done. Now, as my work is here in China, I like to think of it as the work she loved, and as work for Jesus, and I want ever to be a true, faithful and loving mother. She loved others better than herself, and her Jesus best of all."

A DAUGHTER writes of this same mother: "Memory brings to mind many good things from mother's lips—advice, reproof, exhortation, encouragement—but it was from the Bible of her life that she preached most eloquently to us. That daily life was irresistible. There was no getting away from the power of it. What could exhortations to unselfishness and self-denial have accomplished compared with the living examples of self-sacrifice ever before us of a life wholly for others?"

And here is just a glimpse directly into that mother-heart—that human source of whatever love or power her sons and daughters may have taken into their work: Her letters to her children told again and again of the joy that filled her heart when, at last, so near the end of her life, she was permitted actually to begin her work in China. Writing to her eldest son, then a missionary in Alaska, she said: "I hope your heart goes out to your Alaskan brothers and sisters as mine does to these in China—all children with us of the one Father. My heart yearns over them with a great longing. I feel as if I wanted to stretch out my arms and gather them all in and bring them to Jesus. It seems as though I could understand something of how our Lord felt when he said, 'I would have gathered you as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings.'"

This dear, eager mother-heart was laid away on the "Sunny Slope," outside the city wall of Canton, under the "white cloud," but the mother-love and purpose are burning hot in the hearts of her children. The mother example was seed sown for a greater harvest than she could live to reap alone.

This is only one of the many wonderful mothers whose "children rise up and call her blessed." This is only one of the beautiful lives which have translated the great mother-heart of God to the world. Every son and every daughter who reads this all too weak tribute of a love that grows even stronger with the years will know to whom their own tribute is given. Mother's Day, indeed, claims from us more than any other day in all the year save only the days of our Lord's birth and triumph over death.

DO GOOD

DO GOOD! Do good! there's ever a way,
A way where there's a will;
Don't wait till to-morrow but do it to-day,
And to-day, when the morrow comes still.
If you've money you're armed, and can find work enough
In every street, alley, and lane;
If you've bread, cast it off, and the waters,
though rough,
Will be sure and return it again.

If you've only old clothes, an old bonnet or hat,
A kind word, or a smile true and soft,
In the name of a brother, confer it, and that
Shall be counted as gold up aloft;
God careth for all, and his glorious Son
Shines alike on the rich and the poor,
Be thou like him, and bless every one,
And thou'lt be rewarded sure.

Do good! Do good! there's ever a way,
A way where there's a will;
Don't wait till to-morrow, but do it to-day,
And to-day when the morrow comes still.

Madame Vigée Le Brun and Her Daughter

MOST highly prized, and in many respects the most beautiful of the several portraits of herself and her daughter painted by the talented Mme. Vigée Le Brun, greatest of the women artists of the eighteenth century, is the painting to which she gave the name "Morning," an excellent duotone reproduction of which is our present cover subject.

Painted in the zenith of her power, this warm-hearted and truly beautiful woman, in the portrayal of her own joyous personality, clasping with full maternal pride her little daughter, who in turn has thrown her arms about her mother's neck in quick response to the joyous embrace, has given to the world a portrait of a young mother-pride and love that will appeal to the spirit of motherhood as long as the picture shall last. Its exalted place to-day is among the treasures gathered into that exclusive art circle, the Salon Carré of the Louvre in Paris, though its truest sanctum is in the hearts of those who appreciate and care for it.

JUST FOR TO-DAY

I WILL not look along the years
And try to face my future way—
I only need to see my path
For this one day.

O Thou who art my life, my hope,
Who art each weak heart's strength and stay,
Help me to live within the line
That bounds to-day.

Then loving with thy patient love
That waits to lift and heal alway,
My heart can hold no thought, no wish,
Beyond to-day.

THE "TITANIC" INQUEST

Survivors and Others Testify Before the Senatorial Investigation Committee

Harold Bride

HARDLY had the surviving officers of the awful tragedy of the Titanic awakened from their first few hours of sleep ashore when their presence was demanded before a Senatorial investigating committee which had rushed from Washington to begin its work the morning after the Carpathia landed. The great haste was occasioned by a telegram sent by J. Bruce Ismay (it now appears on the advice of Third Officer Lightoller), asking that the S. S. Cedric be held a few hours so that he and the survivors of the crew might return home immediately to prevent their scattering. Mr. Franklin, vice president of the line, realizing that those at sea knew nothing of the proposed inquiry here and being convinced of the inadvisability of the move, refused to comply.

Handicapped though it is by lack of experience in the conduct of marine inquiries, the Senate committee has brought out much of the detail of the great disaster. Some of the most salient of these particulars seem convincing that somewhere, somehow, somebody blundered. On the bridge it was generally known that ice would be encountered about eleven o'clock. The S. S. Californian had sent a wireless warning, yet the ship altered neither course nor speed. It was not till the crow's-nest watch telephoned its warning of ice ahead that the order "hard-a-starboard" was given to the helmsman.

There is now no doubt that three possible rescue ships were nearer than the Carpathia; but here again somebody blundered, and cruel though it may seem, this accusation falls upon the wireless boys, one of whom is gone, and both of whom did such valiant service.

The three ships so near at hand were the Californian, the Frankfurt, a German ship, and the C. P. R. Liner Mount Temple. The latter may have been the vessel whose lights were seen from the decks of the sinking Titanic. It is both asserted and denied that her captain saw the distress signals but deliberately sailed away. Some say the Mount Temple was only a few miles off, but Captain Moore declares they were fifty miles apart and the ice-field lay between. The Frankfurt's operator stopped to ask questions, and by his apparent slow comprehension roused the anger of the Titanic's men (who had in the meantime picked up the Carpathia) and he was told to "stand by and keep out of it." The captain, nevertheless, headed for the scene of the disaster, but arrived hours after the Carpathia.

The White Star Line is making every possible effort to recover as many of the bodies of those drowned as it may. The cable repair steamers Mackay-Bennett and Mina are now at sea searching for the bodies. The most recent word states that about two hundred of the victims—many of them unidentified—had been recovered up to April 25. In many cases recognition is beyond all hope.

The United States Senate Committee, Senator William Alden Smith chairman, met in the Waldorf-Astoria, New York, on April 19 and began the hearing of evidence from survivors of the disaster. Mr. J. Bruce Ismay, managing director of the White Star Line, was the first witness. He testified that at the time of the collision the Titanic was not going at full speed. She was making twenty-one knots, but could easily have made twenty-two or twenty-three knots per hour. Her full speed was seventy-eight revolutions, but she had been slowed down to seventy-two. He was roused from sleep by the collision, and only learned the serious nature of the situation after going on deck. He denied absolutely the current reports that he was with Captain Smith and a party of friends in the café when the vessel struck. He assisted in getting out the boats on B deck and personally helped many women and children in getting aboard. He left on the last lifeboat, which held about forty-five passengers, including four of the crew. At that time there were no women on B deck.

Mr. Ismay told of the Titanic's speed trials at the beginning of the voyage. She had made on the first day between 464 and 474 miles, the second day 576 or 579 miles, and never at full speed. He was not present in any official capacity but as a "voluntary passenger." He denied having any consultation with the captain as to the running of the vessel or as to precautions regarding ice. Up to the time the witness left the Titanic, he saw no passengers jump into the sea. His boat was afloat about four hours before rescue came. He saw no life-preservers and no rafts on the open sea. He did not see the vessel go down—he sat facing the other way, rowing, and "was glad he didn't see her." To the best of his knowledge, the Titanic was equipped with a full complement of lifeboats. "It is not customary to carry rafts," he added. "They are not considered suitable to modern ships." The vessel struck the berg a glancing blow between the end of the forecastle and the captain's bridge. "If she had hit the ice head on, she would probably have been afloat to-day." Mr. Ismay was a ready witness, although there were many questions left unanswered, the witness replying either that he did not know or could not remember.

Captain Rostrom of the Carpathia, who brought the survivors to New York, gave a sailor's graphic story of the rescue. When his ship reached the scene, there were about twenty icebergs from one hundred and fifty to two hundred feet high in the neighborhood of the wreck; this was at 4:10 A.M. on Monday, and by 8:30 he had all the people from the Titanic's boats on board his ship. He told of the wireless signals he had received from the Titanic. The last message said that her engine room was filling. He knew nothing about the Carpathia's operator receiving or answering a message sent by President Taft. He had a message from the Olympic asking if Major Butt was on board, and one from the Chester saying that the President was anxious about the passengers of the Titanic. He personally had charge of every message and he had absolutely no knowledge that the President wished to communicate with the ship. No replies were withheld and no one on the ship attempted in any way to impose a censorship.

William Marconi, the wireless expert and inventor, testified that the Carpathia had a short-distance wireless equipment with a maximum of two hundred miles, while that of the Titanic communicated from five hundred to one thousand miles. He had no personal knowledge of the messages received from the Carpathia, but his impression was that near New York there was some interference. The Carpathia's operator, he understood, was about to go to bed when he providentially caught the Titanic's call for help. The Carpathia had many requests from unknown American stations which were not answered. His company gave no orders about receiving messages and attempted no censorship.

Thomas Cottam, the wireless operator of the Carpathia, a young lad of twenty-one, testified as to the reception of the Titanic's signals. At that time another ship, the Frankfurt, was calling the Titanic, and then the Olympic called her. He was in regular communication with the Titanic until her last message. From the night of the rescue until he reached New York, Cottam slept only three hours. He received no message from President Taft.

Charles W. Lightoller, second officer of the Titanic, in his testimony gave a dramatic story of the disaster. He sent off boatloads of women and stuck to the ship until the water came up to his ankles. There was no wailing nor crying. When the ship made her final plunge, he "took a dive," was sucked down and then was blown up to the surface by some kind of an explosion. A second time he went down, drawn by the suction of the vessel, and came to the surface clinging to a collapsible boat along with thirty others. There was no favoritism in behalf of any of the crew as against the passengers. The women and children were sent because, the witness said, "it was a rule of human nature." Captain Smith had told the witness on Sunday afternoon, when on the bridge, that he had received wireless messages about icebergs, and the witness informed Chief Officer Murdock of this when the latter took the bridge. They were then going between twenty-one and twenty-two knots, the weather being clear and calm. At 8:55 he again saw Captain Smith on the bridge and talked with him about expectations of ice. No orders were given to slow down speed. The captain left the bridge at 9:20 and witness did not see him again until after the collision, when the captain was on the bridge and Murdock alongside. The last order the captain gave to witness was to put the women and children in the boats and "lower away." On leaving the ship in the collapsible boat, he noticed that the people who were in the water all had life-preservers. There were about seventy-five in the boat altogether, mostly firemen, who had been picked up.

At the next day's session of the committee, Saturday, April 20, Cottam, the Carpathia operator, was again a witness. He testified that his last message to the Titanic was to have the lifeboats ready; that the Carpathia was steaming as fast as she could in their direction. He received no further answer. He had no communication with the coast during the rush of the Carpathia to the wreck, but got many messages from other vessels, including several from the Baltic. He did not take records of these. He wired the Baltic news of the catastrophe about 10:30 the morning after the wreck, telling her of the disaster, and that as many passengers as could be found were picked up and were being taken to New York. Cottam said that Captain Rostrom had first decided to go to Halifax, but later changed his mind. This may have been about noon on Monday. He sent no message at any time saying that all passengers had been saved, or that the Titanic was being towed to Halifax, and he never attempted to withhold the facts of the wreck.

The following message was read to the witness:

J. A. Hughes, Huntington, W. Va.—Titanic proceeding to Halifax. Passengers will probably land there Wednesday; all safe. WHITE STAR LINE.

He denied that any such message had ever come from him. Nobody could have sent such a message from the Carpathia except himself, as he was on duty continuously. Bride, the operator rescued from the Titanic, was in the Carpathia's wireless room Wednesday, and though weak and sick, sent out the list of third cabin passengers saved. Bride could not have sent a message saying, "all saved."

Bride, the youthful operator of the Titanic, was brought before the committee in an invalid's chair and with his feet in bandages. He is twenty-two years old. He testified that he did not see Ismay on the Titanic, but believed some messages were transmitted for him. They were sent while off Belfast and related to the speed of the ship in her trials in Belfast Lock. Ismay never came into the wireless office. A message was received late Sunday afternoon from the Leyland steamship Californian, stating that vessel had just passed three large icebergs, and giving their position. This was about five P.M. The witness was questioned very closely regarding this warning message. He had handed it to the bridge officer; he could not remember who was on the bridge; it was not Captain Smith.

The witness then told the story of the collision and the sending out of calls for help. Phillips was in charge of the instrument. The first call was "C. Q. D. M. G. Y." It was explained that the first three letters are the recognized distress call and the last three the code call of the Titanic. It is the message to which all stations must give attention, and means "Great danger; send help quickly." The Frankfurt was the first ship to pick up the call and her response was delivered by Bride to the captain personally, who directed him to ascertain her position. Then came word from the Carpathia. The Titanic's position was wired to the Frankfurt, which replied "stand by," which means "wait for further answer." Mr. Phillips had said the Frankfurt was the nearer vessel. Some time later, the Frankfurt called again and asked what was the matter, and Phillips curtly told her operator to "stand by," and then resumed communications with the Carpathia and Olympic. They never got the position of the Frankfurt. Phillips had talked to her operator very sharply, believing him derelict in his duty in not responding as he should have done. He told him to "stand by and keep out of it." The signal C. Q. D. should have been enough, witness said. [Later news showed that the Frankfurt heeded the signal and speeded to the scene, but arrived several hours after the Carpathia and too late to assist in saving life.]

Great stress was put upon this incident by the committee, as the impression prevailed that the Frankfurt was much nearer than the Carpathia and could have reached the Titanic sooner. Senator Smith suggested that if the operators had not lost their tempers they might have replied that they were sinking, instead of stopping to call the other operator a fool. Bride answered that "C. Q. D. was enough" and "time could not be wasted on a man who could not appreciate that call." Bride and Phillips left the wireless room ten minutes before the ship went down. They had tried to get the Baltic, and succeeded in telling her that they were sinking and could not save the ship. The last Bride saw of the captain was when the latter jumped overboard from the bridge of the Titanic.

Crowds Surrounding the Senate Committee During Its Investigation of the "Titanic" Disaster

A "Titanic" Lifeboat Photographed from the "Carpathia"

On Monday, April 22, the investigation was transferred to Washington. Vice President Franklin of the White Star Line testified that he knew nothing concerning the origin of the false news that the Titanic's passengers were saved. He swore that he never authorized the circulation of such messages, which were mere rumors. He denied that either he or Mr. Marconi had directed the wireless operators to conceal the truth. He admitted receiving wireless messages from Ismay, signed "Yamsi," urging him to hold the liner Cedric so that he (Ismay) and the crew might return to England. The first of these messages was the following:

Most desirable Titanic crew return home Cedric. This includes myself. Have clothing for me, including shoes. Have lost everything myself. (Signed) YAMSI.

To this the witness replied that it would be unwise to hold the Cedric. There were four of these messages, but witness always refused. Being asked why he used the word "unwise," he replied that Mr. Ismay did not know of the circumstances and the proposed investigation in New York, as he (Mr. Franklin) did.

He sent a number of messages on the Monday of the wreck in the effort to obtain accurate news of the Titanic and her passengers, but got no reliable answer until 6 or 6.30 P.M., when this wireless message came addressed "Ismay, New York":

Doppin—Carpathia reached Titanic position at daybreak. Found boats and wreckage only. Titanic had foundered about twenty minutes past two o'clock. All her boats accounted for. About 675, mostly all women and children, saved.

This message he gave to the press at once. He told in detail of his subsequent efforts to learn from the Olympic and other vessels whether there were survivors on the Virginian or Parisian. He declared that he had not received any direct information from the Carpathia, although he made frequent attempts. He knew nothing of any orders to the wireless operators Cottam or Bride, to keep silent, and denied that he had enjoined silence upon anybody, or that he knew of Mr. Ismay giving such orders. Captain Rostrom of the Carpathia had wired the Cunard Line, Tuesday morning, stating that he had 800 of Titanic's passengers and was coming to New York. Two days later, on Wednesday, Franklin received a message from Ismay announcing the foundering of the vessel with great loss of life, and that he (Ismay) was arranging to send details. Remarking upon this message, witness said:

"I have no doubt it was sent off from the Carpathia as soon as the survivors were picked up."

The "Titanic" Inquiry

AMAZEMENT and indignation have followed the developments in the Senate committee's investigation of the Titanic disaster. It has revealed scenes of heroic suffering, of splendid courage and of indifference to the despairing cries of hundreds of drowning men and women—a tale altogether without a parallel in the annals of shipwreck. And it has already gone far toward fixing the responsibility for this needless sacrifice of 1,600 human lives. These are the essential points of the evidence, summarized from the committee's records:

1. An undrilled crew, unequal to a sudden emergency through lack of training.
2. Life-saving appliances totally inadequate to save more than one-third of those on board.
3. Criminal disregard of wireless warnings from S. S. "America" and "Californian."
4. Greatest speed in time of greatest danger. Contrast with S. S. "Californian," which stopped her engines on entering same ice-field.
5. Disregard of warnings from lookout in "Titanic's" crow's-nest and failure to provide lookout with marine glasses.
6. Lack of discipline in filling lifeboats, resulting in several leaving half-filled.
7. Cowardice and brutality on part of officers, who refused, when in half-filled boats, to row back and rescue survivors who were calling for help. Some even compelled women to row.
8. Defective lifebelts, which went to pieces in the water instead of saving the wearers.
9. Dissemination of false and misleading information for eighteen hours after the disaster.

Attempts by White Star officials to avoid the investigation by leaving the jurisdiction of the Senate committee were fortunately frustrated. They have been compelled to tell to the world the story of this frightful calamity, and upon that presentation the people of two continents must sit in impartial judgment. What will be the verdict?

Mr. Ismay, managing director of the White Star Line, eager to placate public opinion, has already directed that hereafter all vessels in the companies with which he is connected shall carry enough lifeboats and belts to supply every passenger. This is eleventh-hour wisdom if not repentance. But it has still to be explained why the White Star director, safe in the lifeboat into which he was bundled by a friendly officer of the Titanic, gave no hand of help to the hundreds of his passengers, who were perishing in the icy sea within a few boat-lengths of him. There were plenty who heard the piteous and despairing cries for help, and some few actually did help; but the White Star director heard and saw none of those indescribable agonies that others witnessed. During those terrible scenes, the mere outline of which has wrung the heart of two nations, he sat safely there in his boat, with his back turned to it all.

It is reassuring to know that the Senate committee means to make the inquest thorough as well as impartial and that no witness will be permitted to leave its jurisdiction until all the material facts are brought to light.

Our Immigration Problem

THIS year promises to surpass all previous records in the extent of foreign immigration to the United States. They are coming in a flood, at the rate of 2,000 and 3,000 a day. March showed a total of 83,654 at the port of New York alone, and April has exceeded it by many thousands. The total immigration at all our ports in 1910 was 1,198,037, and last year 1,030,300. Now, if all of these incoming strangers were "desirable," there could be no question about their coming being a good thing for the country; but arriving in such vast numbers, it is practically impossible to exercise a proper discrimination, and the result is the admission of many who are not desirable in any sense. Last year we excluded 23,349, or about 2.1 per cent. of the total, but proper compliance with the laws would have shut out a much larger number. It cannot be doubted that a considerable percentage of our immigration in recent years is not of the sort that is of substantial benefit to the country. Many are induced to come through the glowing descriptions scattered by agents abroad, who care nothing for the quality of the immigration they stimulate. Aliens with physical, mental and moral defects; the illiterate, the wholly dependent, and those who are without any training that would qualify them as wage-earners, do not add any valuable element to our population, but the reverse. They take the place in the industrial ranks of skilled and intelligent men and women who will not work for a miserable pittance which the unskilled aliens accept. Through these abnormal conditions, life becomes to thousands a continuous struggle for existence, and the standard of wages and living is lowered to a dangerous point. Our lax immigration system has wrought widespread evil during the last ten years, and it would be folly to permit it to go on unregulated. There was a time, not many years ago, when practically all of our immigration was of a character that we could safely welcome. Scandinavian, Teutonic, British, Bohemian, French, North Italian—all were immigrants among whom the percentage of illiteracy was very small. This cannot be asserted of the average arrivals to-day from Southern and Eastern Europe, among whom the percentage of illiteracy is 31.09.

The Confidence of Youth

TWELVE ambitious young students in Cornell, according to the daily newspapers, have undertaken one of the most tremendous tasks of the age. They have organized themselves as a body of philosophic investigators, "to study and criticize the existing creeds and religions of the day, with a view to reconstructing religious thought and setting it on a basis of fact and truth, instead of needless tradition and superstition." Excellent! If those young aspirants to deathless fame would only add a few more congenial tasks to their program, it would be complete. They ought by all means to reconstruct the sciences, formulate a new philosophy of everyday life, abolish poverty, put labor and capital on an equal footing, and devise a very much needed universal language for the diffusion of their own ideas. Youth is the heyday for brave deeds, and it is well that it should be so. Probably a dozen or a score of years hence, when the "golden season" is becoming merely a memory, they may think better of religion and value more highly what they now esteem as "needless faith." However, much is to be forgiven to the beautiful confidence of juvenescence, which, with a laugh and a song, dashes at peaks whose slippery steeps have baffled the greatest climbers, and grapples with mysteries to solve which no Œdipus has yet been found.

Propagators of Crime

WE HEAR from various sources that the moving picture men are planning to place before a defenseless public a realistic presentation of the Hillsville, Va., court tragedy. Through some influence which is difficult to reconcile with ideas of common decency, they have been permitted to use the court house, and re-enact therein the scenes of that fatal forenoon, when the mountaineers executed sudden vengeance on the judge and court officers. This is, indeed, carrying realism to the last degree. There should be a limit to the representation of scenes of a criminal character, and surely this is a good time to draw the line. In the interest of public decency, and especially for the sake of the young, who have already been subjected to too many moving picture horrors in the shape of crimes of almost every description, we enter a protest against this production. The criminal suggestions to be conveyed would be repulsive and degrading to any audience, and especially to the young. We have already heard of many well-attested instances in which deeds of violence, seen in moving pictures, were emulated by young spectators, to the everlasting sorrow and shame of their relations. Any municipality that has the slightest respect for the morals of its people, especially of its youth, should put a veto on this vicious exhibition, and forbid it to be shown within its jurisdiction.

"Nearer, My God, to Thee"

ANOTHER hymn has been baptized with tears. It will be many months before that hymn can be sung by the Christian congregations of America and England without a catch in the throat and a mist before the eyes. It is one of the rare pictures of history, the sturdy men, carrying out the grim precedent of the sea that sets the bandsmen playing when the ship faces danger and keeps them playing while she sinks from sight. And it is a memory which will bless mankind forever that the Titanic's band played "Nearer, My God, to Thee" as the great ship settled into the waves.

Clinging to an overturned lifeboat another group of men awaited their fate. The last sad strains of the ship's band had been hushed by the silent sea; the ship herself had found her grave; there was no sight nor sound of help at hand. What more natural than that some man should suggest that they pray together? What so natural as that they should unite, in the moment of utmost peril, without thought of differences of creed, in saying gently, with tight-shut eyes: "Our Father, who art in heaven!"

Sometimes we work fast and hard to get away from God. But when all other stays are swept away, all other sounds are stilled, all other lights go out, there is one inevitable direction for the mind of a man—and that is toward God. The prayers that rose from the sea on that unspeakable night will all be answered. Some who prayed were saved from drowning, as the men on this overturned boat were saved; some who prayed sank out of sight, but found God as they died. And the prayer those brave musicians made is being answered in two continents, as it was answered for them, praying in their hearts while lips and hands sent out the strains of the prayer-song over the waves. They are nearer, now, to God. And all the civilized world has nestled nearer to him since they played, with gallant faith, that universal prayer.

THE TITANIC

LORD of the everlasting hills,
God of the boundless sea,
Help us through all the shocks of fate
To keep our faith in thee.

When nature's unrelenting arm
Sweeps us like withes away,
Maker of man, be thou our strength
And our eternal stay.

When blind, insensate, heartless force
Puts out our passing breath,
Make us to see thy guiding light
In darkness and in death.

Beneath the roll of soundless waves
Our best and bravest lie;
Give us to feel their spirits live
Immortal in the sky.

We are thy children frail and small,
Formed of the lowly sod;
Comfort our bruised and bleeding souls,
Father and Lord and God.

HALL CAINE.

Men's Forward Religious Movement

THE Men and Religion Forward Movement reached its climax in the Christian Conservation Congress in New York City from April 19 to 24. The main sessions were held in Carnegie Hall, while meetings were held in the interest of the several departments of Christian work, especially as it related to men and boys. The program for morning, afternoon and night of each day included the names of some of the greatest intellects and hearts of this nation and of other countries. At the Union Square out-of-door meeting, where ten thousand men gathered, three thousand of them within the ropes, William Jennings Bryan made a memorable address on the Bible. Among other things he said: "Government is good, but the influence of religion is better. Begin life with God. If you do not do so your life will be a riddle that you will never solve. If any of you have been led to look upon the Bible as a man-made book, I want you to put the opposite theory to the test. If we only live up to the things we do understand, we will be so busy doing good we will have no time to bother about the things in God's Word that we do not understand. Had I been on the Titanic facing death, do you think I should have wanted any one then to read me a chapter of Darwin's Origin of Species, about animal ancestors, or any volume of doubt? No; I should have gone to my Bible for courage and faith, and to Christ the refuge of the soul." Expert reports of the various commissions are to be printed in eight volumes, to perpetuate the influence of the Men and Religion Forward Movement. The movement has profoundly stirred the men and boys of the nation to renewed loyalty to the church and to unselfish service for humanity and God. The movement is a call to the strong men of the church to service and to sacrifice, the keynote being:

Even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many. (Matt. 20: 28.)

New Service for Goats

THE United States Government is making arrangements to put six hundred goats into the forest reserve in the San Bernardino Mountains to eat up the underbrush and thus protect the reservation from forest fires. Mr. R. H. Charlton, who has charge of the matter, has made an agreement with C. A. Brenkerhoff, of Safford, Ariz., to ship the six hundred goats, and it is expected that in a few days they will be at their happy and benevolent task. It is claimed that this is as efficient a method of clearing the fire-breaks as to send a force of men for the purpose into the reserve, and it is far less expensive. The goat was of the greatest importance to the Jews. Used for religious sacrifices, its flesh and milk for food, its hair for clothing, curtains, tents, it seemed indispensable to their economy. Our government has found a new service for them, in organizing them into a fire department to prevent the destruction of the forest. If these six hundred goats and the four hundred likely to follow them will do what is planned for them, they will make a picture something like the one described in Solomon's Song:

Thy hair is as a flock of goats, that appear from Mount Gilead. (Sol. Song. (4: 1.))

Two Lords Fruit-Farming

THE high cost of living and excessive taxes have prompted several of England's nobility to emigrate to Canada. The latest to arrive were Lord and Lady George Herbert Hyde of Hertfordshire, and Lord Arthur Somers, who passed through New York City recently on their way to their new farm. The two noblemen are each over six feet tall and look as though they would make husky farmers. "A year ago Lord Somers visited Canada and found a farm in a place called Pickering, twenty miles from Toronto," said Lord Hyde. "He came back and told us that it was ideally situated for a fruit farm and that we could do well. After long discussion we purchased two hundred and sixty acres and then began to sell our property in Hertfordshire and prepare to emigrate. Lady Hyde and myself have never been here before, but we are confident of Lord Somers's selection, and the latest report I received from Pickering indicated that we would have a good market for our fruit both in that town and in Toronto. So here we are, all ready for hard work, able and ready to plow the land, prune trees, hoe weeds, pick fruit, pack it and drive a team to the nearest market and get the cash for our labor. We don't intend to hire any help until we have things going well." How sensible for people to do as these have done! Rather than eat up their estates in idleness as many of high birth or title have done, they have concluded to get right down to the earth and obey the royal law of labor. It is likely that these amateur farmers will not find the path of practical farming so rosy as their hopes picture. The royal law of labor is:

Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work. (Ex. 20: 9.)

Risked Life for Another

RECENTLY in New York City Patrolman Walter Thornton leaped into the Hudson River at Canal Street, and after a desperate struggle rescued a drowning man; but when an ambulance arrived from the Hudson Street Hospital the man was dead. Thornton was taken to the hospital in a serious condition. Charles H. Kempt, a watchman, employed on the long pier at Canal Street, had heard a cry and a splash and yelled for help. Thornton responded. The drowning man grabbed the policeman with all of his remaining strength, but Thornton managed to fight him off and hold him in such a position that he could swim with him toward the pier. After Thornton had been in the water twenty minutes he got the drowning man to the pier and both were lifted up with the aid of a rope. The rescued man was dead, and Thornton was so exhausted that he could not stand. The everyday acts of heroism on the part of our policemen, firemen, and those engaged in extra hazardous employments should make us proud of our fellow men and thankful to God. It was a pity that Thornton took such risk and went to so much trouble and then failed to save his man alive, but his motive and sacrifice were just the same as though he had been successful, and he secured the praise of men and the favor of heaven. There was One who saved those he undertook to save but in doing so lost his own life. What do we not owe to him?

Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren. (I. John 3: 16.)

Daughter of Distinguished Ancestry

MISS ITALIA GARIBALDI, a granddaughter of General Garibaldi, the Italian liberator, went to Minneapolis as an official delegate to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. She came from Rome, where she holds a prominent position in the educational and religious work of her church as the head of a girls' home school for the children of the poor. The present generation of Garibaldis is hardly less gifted than was the famous general. Miss Italia's eldest brother is General Peppino Garibaldi, who made a name for himself in South Africa while fighting on the British side against the Boers. Later on he fought against General Castro in Venezuela, and more recently still he captured the city of Juarez, in Mexico, when fighting for President Madero. At present he is on a mission to Paris for Madero, although he is but thirty years of age. A second brother is fighting in Tripoli. A sister is a nurse on a Red Cross ship engaged in bringing wounded Italians from the seat of war. The father of this war-loving family is an Italian general who has fought in the armies of France and Greece, while the mother conducts a hospital at Maddalena on the island of Sardinia. Miss Garibaldi in her character and life has illustrated her spiritual royal lineage as described by the apostle:

But we are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, that ye should show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvelous light. (I. Peter 2: 9.)

Stead and the Miners

AT a dinner given by the Church Federation of New York City, Gipsy Smith the evangelist told this incident indicating the deep spirituality of W. T. Stead, the London journalist and philanthropist, and the power of his pen in soul-saving. He said that Stead, who was to have spoken for the Men and Religion Forward Movement that night, but went down on the Titanic, was one of the dearest friends on the earth, and most valuable helps in the work in Great Britain. He said Stead was the best friend the pastor ever had, that he was present at every Wednesday night prayer meeting, and that he always took a part in this service. The evangelist said that one night he was holding a revival service in London when Stead was present, and a miner came up to him and asked whether he could speak to Mr. Stead. Mr. Stead said he would be glad to listen to him. The miner said he was one of a company of five miners who prided themselves on their skepticism. Four had gone to their work and he had taken the day off to come to the meeting and thank him for his editorial which had knocked the bottom from under their unbelief, and brought them to saving faith in Christ. The miner took him by the hand to thank God and him for his service, and as he did so Stead wept like a child, and said to Gipsy Smith, "I would rather have had that humble tribute to my share in saving souls and the shake of that miner's hand than the praise and handshake of the greatest king or queen on earth." The sea cannot drown nor can death touch such a man as this. His crown of immortality is full of the stars of the souls he has saved. This man known and respected throughout the civilized world reached the summit of his greatness in his interest in the salvation of the souls of the humblest, and answered the description of the prophet:

They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmanent; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever. (Dan 12: 3.)

THE WHITE CARNATION

By MARGARET SANGSTER

I

HERE'S to the White Carnation,
Sturdy and spicy and sweet,
Wafting a breath of perfume
On the stony way of the street;
Bringing a freight of gladness
Wherever the breezes blow;
Here's to the White Carnation,
Pure as the virgin snow.

II

This is the flower for Mother,
Wear it on Mother's Day;
Flower for rain and sunshine,
Winsome, gallant and gay.
Wear it in Mother's honor
Pinned on the coat's lapel;
Wear it in belt and corsage,
For her who has loved you well.

III

The Mother in lowly cabin,
The Mother in palace hall,
Is ever the truest and dearest,
And ever the best of all.
In travail and pain she bore us,
In laughter and love she nursed,
And he that would shame the Mother
Is of all mankind accursed.

IV

Tired and wan too often,
Weary and weak at times,
But always full of the courage
That thrills when the future chimes.
Mother, with hands toil-hardened,
Mother, in pearls and lace,
The light of heavenly beauty
Shines on her tender face.

V

So here's to the White Carnation,
Wear it on Mother's Day;
Flower that blooms for Mother,
Winsome, gallant and gay.
Flower of a perfect sweetness,
Flower for hut and hall,
Here's to the White Carnation
And to Mother—our best of all.

America's Tribute to Motherhood

WE KEEP a number of red-letter days during the round of the year, and each of them makes its special appeal and gives its individual opportunity for happy observance. From New Year's Day in January to Christmas Day in December there is a shining road over which we walk with pilgrim staff and shoon. At intervals on this road there are stations at which we stop to rest, to praise and to play. In February we have the birthdays of Washington and Lincoln, patriotic anniversaries when we remember the nation's heroes and give God thanks for their glorious lives. In March our fellow citizens of Irish birth and lineage keep St. Patrick's Day and sing that tenderest of lyrics, "The Wearing of the Green." Next in order, on the second Sunday of May, we have the Day of the White Carnation, a day consecrated to motherhood, and fittingly celebrated in the churches and Sunday Schools and in private homes by the universal consent of all who have been rocked in the cradle and lulled to sleep in childhood and helped over hard places in maturity by mother-wisdom and mother-love. May has also Memorial Day, when we decorate the graves of those who wore the gray and the blue, and fell in the Civil War. June brings us Children's Day, July Independence Day, September Labor Day, October Columbus Day, November Thanksgiving.

April is apparently the only month in the calendar in which we might have the privilege of paying a deserved tribute to the devotion, self-sacrifice and faithful service rendered by the father to the home and family. Fathers are the first to lead the van in reverence and honor to her who presides over the destinies of the race, since her eternal prerogative is "to bear, to nurse, to rear."

Although neither Mother's Day nor Children's Day is a legal holiday, each of these is something better, being kept on the Lord's Day, which comes to us straight from heaven as our Father's gift. In the dawn of creation, one day in seven was set apart as a hallowed pause when labor should cease and body and soul be refreshed and strengthened.

Several years ago the happy thought came to Miss Anna Jarvis of Philadelphia to select a day in the exquisite May-time of the year, a day of fragrance, light and bloom, for the recognition of motherhood. She thought of a flower to be worn on the day, and choosing the second Sunday of the beautiful month, designated the white carnation as the fitting symbol. Pure as the drifted snow, with a spicy perfume and a lasting quality that well describe the virtue and patience of the mother, this flower, worn on corsage or lapel, is peculiarly appropriate. Women were less enthusiastic than men when the founder presented her idea to the public, obviously because it is the province of man rather than of woman to lead the march when praise of the mother is the goal in view. One and a quarter million of men, the Modern Woodmen of America, at the suggestion of their consul, Hon. A. R. Talbot, immediately adopted the idea and took the initiative in keeping Mother's Day. At present, there are few Sunday Schools from coast to coast where the day this year will not be observed by a special program including recitations from the Bible, hymns and addresses, impressing on the minds of children their obligation to be helpful, obedient and loving to their mothers. As a nation we owe a debt of great magnitude to the heroic Pilgrim Mothers who crossed the ocean and bore the heavier end of the suffering and sacrifice for which we venerate the Pilgrim Fathers. The old graveyard at Plymouth, Mass., eloquently shows us how many of these brave mothers died in those first hard years of struggle and peril. We should never have had George Washington to lead us in the Revolution if he had not been trained in stern virtues by his mother, Mary Ball, who lives in history as a matron of Roman type.

Abraham Lincoln, in the obscurity of his early childhood, was trained by his stepmother, Nancy Hanks, who became Nancy Lincoln. Great men the world over have had great mothers and, the world over, too, men both great and small unite in devotion to the mother. There are few exceptions to the rule. It obtains in the Far East and the Far West alike. Let us therefore joyfully swell the number of those who shall wear the Mother's flower on Mother's Day.

Madonna; From the Painting by Gari Melchers

Original Owned by the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York City

THIS exquisite picture, brimful of the atmosphere of Spring, with the sweetness of childhood and the joy of motherhood in every line, makes an appeal to the heart. The mother with the child in her arms is the serene, loving, unselfish woman who presides at our tables, croons lullabys to her babes, keeps house for us, and inspires the best that we do and are. It is the modern Madonna who makes the world possible and illuminates the darkest pathway with the light of her love and devotion.

China's Progressive Spirit

IT IS certainly remarkable that China, for ages the most conservative nation in the world, should to-day by leaps and strides become in some degree so radical and liberal that the spectator stands amazed. The latest feature that surprises us is that in the new republic China gives woman an equal share in the ballot with men. Remembering the previous condition of semi-servitude peculiar to Oriental women and inherent in Oriental civilization, we cannot but wonder at the acumen and gallantry of the men who have to do with forming the new government. There is, to be sure, a restrictive qualification as to the vote, but this affects men and women in the same way. The one of either sex who wishes to vote must possess some property and know how to read and write. There is a stirring of energy on the part of Chinese women who have hitherto been deprived of education. They are now determined to know the alphabet, to read and write, and the day is not distant when they will claim the educational privileges of women in other lands.

HOME

BY FREDERICK ORIN BARTLETT

THE morning sun blazed through the small panes and struck full upon the little breakfast table by the window. It was set for two. In one place the spotless damask had been deftly patched. The silver was so brightly polished that it looked almost new. The sugar-bowl and cream-pitcher were of old china and bore a quaint design of red and yellow roses, but the plates were modern.

The whole house as well as this room was of an older generation. It was low and broad through-out, solid and honest to its very core. The furniture was of to-day.

Warren came into the room studying his watch. His face was sharp and eager, and there were furrows in it ten years ahead of their time, for he was only thirty. He called his wife.

"Molly."

The answer came from the direction of the kitchen.

"Yes, Joe. The chops will be ready in a minute."

"Never mind the chops," he called back. "I want to see you a second."

Through the door to the left a woman of twenty-five appeared. She wore an apron. Her eyes were as clear as the morning sky; the gold in her brown hair was as the gold in the sun; her cheeks flushed red were as new wine. She was as young and fragrant as any of the new-born spring things of which the June world outside was just now full.

"Molly," he began abruptly. "I don't want to hurt you, but I can't let a chance like this slip by. If I can raise another thousand our fortunes are made."

His wife searched his eyes with a startled look, from which he turned away. All the spring vanished from her face.

"You don't mean—"

"I'm going down to Sanderson's and borrow the money on the house," he broke in. "I must have it before 'Change opens this morning."

She stood dumb. She felt quite helpless.

"Don't make me feel like a brute about it," he said irritably.

She shook her head sideways, His the hurt in her eyes drove him on to defend himself further.

"You're a little Puritan about such matters, Molly. A bank cashier has as much right as any one else to improve a business chance with his own money. And this isn't even a chance; it's a sure thing. I guess what's right for Grover as president of the bank is right for me, isn't it?"

She nodded.

"And you don't suppose Grover is putting his whole fortune into a scheme that isn't sure, do you?"

"You've put in all our savings. I don't mind that. But this—this is home, Joe."

She spoke the word "home" almost reverently. Evidently she made some big distinction here which she expected would be self-evident to him. Clearly it had some effect, for he crossed to her side and took her in his arms.

"I want something better than this for you," he said.

She buried her face on his shoulder.

"It's home, Joe," she trembled. "It's where we began, and I love it. I don't want anything else."

He kissed her hair and patted her back as though she were a child.

"You don't know," he said abruptly. "You're buried here. You belong in New York."

He hurried out, and a moment later she heard the door close behind him. She went back into the kitchen and placed the chops over the stove where they would keep warm. Then she returned and for a few seconds stared big-eyed around the room. Then she found a dust-cloth and began to tidy the mantle over the fireplace. Her touch was as gentle as a caress.

"'You've put in all our savings. . . . But this—this is home'"

It was only eight years ago that Warren had brought her as a bride to this old homestead fifty miles from the city. In the blending that took place in the ardor of her young love this house had become part of her as her husband had become part of her. Into it for a year and a few brief months her boy had come; out of it he had gone. So it was not only her home, but it was the boy's home.

She dusted the woodwork below the mantle, and then, kneeling, she dusted the hearth. Then she began to dust the molding which circled the room until she came upon a smootch left by five small fingers. She caught her breath at this and bowing her head began to cry very softly to herself.

When the door-bell rang it brought her to her feet like an alarm. With the dust-cloth still in her hand she hurried out to find herself confronting a tall, heavily-veiled woman. The latter asked in a low voice and hesitatingly,

"Is Mr. Warren at home?"

"No," answered Molly, "but I expect him back soon."

"Then—may I come in and wait?"

Molly swung open the door and stood aside. The woman entered and removed her veil. She looked to be about sixty. She had a kind, motherly face, but her eyes were heavy, and she was pale as though recovering from a long illness.

"This is Mrs. Warren?" she asked.

"Yes," answered Molly.

The woman did not offer her own name. She shivered as though cold.

"Come into the dining room," said Molly. "It's warmer there."

The stranger followed and sank into a chair in the sun.

"Mayn't I get you a cup of coffee?" inquired Molly anxiously. "It is all ready."

"You are kind, but—pray don't trouble. It rests me just to be here. It is so sunny and bright."

With her head back she studied the girl a moment. Once she closed her eyes as though a soothing hand had been passed over her forehead. When she opened them again she smiled.

"This is so good," she murmured; "so fresh—so quiet. You have always lived here?"

"Ever since I was married," Molly answered.

The stranger nodded.

"There's no home like the first home," she said.

"Then," cried Molly from the depth of her heart, "why do people want to move?"

"You aren't thinking of it?"

"Mr. Warren talks of New York and—"

The woman interrupted her.

"He has talked recently of New York?" she demanded, sitting up.

"This morning."

The stranger drew a deep breath. Then she said through tight lips:

"Don't let him. Don't ever let him mention it again."

"But he thinks I'm unhappy here. He can't see."

"I know," the stranger nodded.

She leaned forward and seized the girl's hand.

"Oh, how blind they get—these men!" she whispered. "We must open their eyes somehow. We must do it for their sakes—for their sakes as well as our own."

Molly was startled. The woman spoke with tragic earnestness. When she had finished she leaned back as though exhausted.

"Sit down beside me," she murmured. "I want to talk to you, if—if I can."

Confused and mystified, Molly drew up a chair beside the stranger and waited for her to speak. She felt as though she were watching some grim drama, and yet she felt as though she herself had a part in it, too.

The woman leaned forward and patted the girl's hand.

"Have you children?" she asked.

Molly drew back pale and trembling. She did not answer.

"Oh!" exclaimed the woman, and it sounded like a cry within a cry. Her lips trembled and her eyes grew moist. She groped for the girl's hand until she found it again. She gripped it firmly.

"I lost three," she explained.

"Three!" gasped Molly.

"Three boys."

The younger woman shuddered.

"I don't see how you lived through it," she moaned.

"I didn't," said the stranger.

As she spoke her face grew hard as flint. Molly rose to her feet and her lips became tense and her eyes hot and dry. The stranger looked up swiftly, studying the girl with sudden fear. Then her face softened once more.

"It was a boy who went away from you?" she asked.

The girl nodded.

"It was long ago?"

"Sometimes it seems like a million years, and sometimes only yesterday," answered Molly.

The stranger caught her breath.

"You shouldn't have let him go at all," she said.

"Let him go?" groaned the girl. "He was stolen from me! I held on as tight as I could, and yet they took him away from me."

She was pale and she panted for breath.

"Don't!" she cried fiercely, covering her eyes. "I've tried hard to forget. Why do you bring it all back?"

"Because," the stranger answered quietly, "I don't want you to forget. Because you mustn't forget."

"I'll go mad if I don't."

"You'll die if you do. Come here; come here by my side."

Impulsively Molly knelt and buried her face in the older woman's lap. The latter smoothed back the golden-brown hair and talked on as though partly to herself.

"After the third went I too tried to forget," she said. "I put away all the baby things; I put away all the toys. I put away his blocks, his horse and cart, his tin boxes and his spools, and the baby books that were all smootched and torn."

"Oh," sobbed the girl, "those books were the hardest of all to see around."

"Yes, dear. So I put them away too."

"Mine are in the attic," cried the girl. "They are packed away in the bottom of a trunk."

"I lost mine," said the stranger. "I lost mine in a fire fifteen years ago."

Molly glanced up.

"I—I'm so sorry for you," she said.

"I thought it didn't matter. At first it seemed to make things easier for Frank—my husband. It helped him to forget. He was able to throw himself into his business heart and soul after that."

She paused.

"Somehow," she went on as though amazed that it was so, "this brings me back to what I came here for.'

"You haven't told me—your name," said Molly gently.

The woman hesitated. Then she said with an effort,

"I am Mrs. Grover—President Grover's wife."

"You are President Grover's wife!" exclaimed the girl.

She started to rise. The woman checked her.

"Sit still—a moment!" she pleaded. "It's going to be easier now to say—what I wanted to say. I think you'll understand me now. I myself seem to understand now."

She kissed the girl's hair.

"I think," she went on, "I think that as my husband forgot the toys he forgot many other things. He forgot what he wanted the children to stand for; he forgot what he wanted his home to stand for. He relied more and more on his money to satisfy all his desires and mine. We left the first home soon after this. Then it wasn't long before we left the second home. Then he built one house after another—each house more expensive than the last. I couldn't stop him; I couldn't make him see that it wasn't the house that counted. And so all these years we have been homeless."

The girl looked up, not understanding yet why this confession was being made to her.

"Hush!" pleaded Mrs. Grover. "Let me tell you in my own way."

She spoke with more difficulty now, but she forced out the words.

"Now he is planning for the most expensive house of all. He wants a palace, and with it he wants a fortune. For this he has risked all his money on one big venture. If he succeeds he becomes very wealthy; if he loses, he loses all."

"I know!" cried the girl excitedly. "And Joe too—"

Mrs. Grover seized the girl's arm.

"Don't—don't tell me your husband is with him!"

"Joe learned about the scheme in some way," answered the frightened girl. "He too has risked all our savings. He has risked even this—our home."

"Even your home?" gasped Mrs. Grover.

"That's what he went out for—to find some one to lend him money on our home."

"You said he was coming back?" demanded Mrs. Grover.

"Yes! Yes!"

Mrs. Grover relaxed as though a throttling hand at her throat had suddenly been removed. Molly was on her feet staring at the door.

"Listen!" said Mrs. Grover quickly. "My husband is on his way down here. He is desperate; mad. You must understand—he isn't himself! He sees ruin unless—unless he can borrow more money."

"Joe has no money," the girl interrupted.

Mrs. Grover lowered her voice.

"No, but—but the bank has. Frank paced his room all last night. In his agony he told me his plans. He wishes to borrow without security—without any one knowing. Your husband is cashier; so—so he would find out. Frank is—is coming here to—to ask him to say nothing."

"Mr. Grover is going to take from the bank!" exclaimed the girl. "Is that honest?"

"No. But he can't see it—now. He thinks he can return the money tomorrow. You see—he has forgotten the toys."

The girl drew away in horror.

"But Joe won't help him do that!" she cried.

"You don't know what men forget—at such times."

"Why, that's stealing!"

"Yes! yes! It's nothing else. But men get blind. They get blind, I tell you, when the toys aren't around. They think it's ruin to lose when it's ruin to win. I want him to lose. I prayed God all yesterday that he might lose before to-day. Then he would have had to come back home. Don't you see? Then I—just I and the boys—would be home to him."

She struggled to her feet and rested her hand for support on the young woman's shoulder.

"That," she whispered, "that is what we must make our men see again."

Molly was still staring at the door. She was breathing rapidly.

"This morning," she said, "I felt—I feared what you've already lived through. When the boy was here, and before—this was home to Joe. Then we put away the toys—because they hurt. And now this is only a house. He wants to go away."

"And if he goes he may never again find home," said the older woman.

Almost as in a dream Molly took a few steps toward the door. It seemed as though she must go at once to the attic. There was an ache in her, bigger than any she had known since the boy went, for those things in the bottom of the trunk.

"You must understand," broke in Mrs. Grover, "that if my husband loses, your husband too will lose. All your savings will go."

"Yes," said Molly.

"Ah, but you will receive big interest on them," said Mrs. Grover. "It is when our men lose that we women count for most."

With a little cry the girl vanished. Five minutes later she returned with a big pasteboard box in her arms. Her eyes were moist, and she held it in the hollow of her arm as a woman holds a child. She placed it on the floor at Mrs. Grover's feet, and knelt beside it. She drew out first a small tin can in which crackers had come.

"See!" she gulped, holding it up. "He liked this best of all. He liked to put on the cover and take it off again."

It was dented where the boy had banged it on the floor. Mrs. Grover stooped and kissed one of the dents.

"Oh!" gasped the girl. "Where do they go? That's what I want to know. Where do they go when they leave us?"

"They don't go very far unless we send them far," answered the older woman through dry lips.

The girl drew out an animal book. It was rumpled and torn. Near the picture of a horse there was a finger-mark. She bent over this and kissed it feverishly. Then she looked up with a smile in her wet eyes.

"He used to cluck when he saw the horse," she said.

Mrs. Grover drew the girl's head to her lap.

"Little mother," she sobbed, "I think the boys are very near us this minute—your one and my three."

The outside door opened, and before the women could move Warren strode into the room with Grover at his heels. Both men were pale and nervous.

"I must hurry off, Molly," Warren began.

Then he stopped. Grover behind him seized his arm. The two stared first at the women and then at the book, and then again at the women. Warren felt as though some one had seized him by the throat. Grover was perspiring like a man with a fever.

With her eyes fixed upon her husband, Molly rose, the book in her hand. She walked to his side and held it out to him.

"You remember, Joe," she faltered. "He used to cluck when he saw the horse."

Warren shrank back and refused to touch the book.

"See where he put his fingers, Joe. I—I never could keep his little hands clean."

He began to shake all over.

"Good heavens!" he demanded hoarsely. "Why did you get out these?"

"I was very lonesome," she whispered, "so I brought them down."

He took her in his arms and glared at Grover.

The latter strode past them both to his wife. She had staggered toward him.

"You were worried about me?" he asked. "I ought to have let you know when I went. And now these things—these things have upset you?"

"She had one," said Mrs. Grover, "and she has all his things. We had three, and—and we have nothing."

He looked at the little tin can on the floor. Then he looked at his wife. Then he placed his arm about her and tried to soothe her. And he used the same words when the third went and had not used since.

"So, Mary, so," he said.

As though from a great distance he heard Warren's voice.

"You'd better stay here to breakfast. I guess it doesn't make much difference what time you get to the bank."

Grover brought his lips together. He felt his wife clutch his arm.

"All right!" he said grimly.

Press Opinions on the Disaster

—HEREAFTER TRANSATLANTIC travelers will not be so much impressed by the swimming-pools, billiard-rooms, theaters and various other ship luxuries as by the provisions made for their safety.—New York World.

—THESE GRAND MEN lie at the bottom of the sea, but their names are enshrined in the heart of humanity everywhere. They imitated Calvary in that they died for others, and tragic as it is, away down the years the memory of it will bless mankind.—Ohio State Journal.

—"WOMEN AND CHILDREN first!" Every sea has heard that command to stand fast and die that the weaker and the helpless might be saved. On every sea has it been obeyed by strong men of our race. "The lesser breeds without the law" may do otherwise. But this is our law.—The Chicago Inter-Ocean.

—THE DISPLAY OF such heroism as was seen in the Titanic disaster, the heroism of men who had not been deemed heroic, is the one bright spot in those hours of gloom. Perhaps pride was with many the impelling motive, but if it was, it was that noble pride that, in an emergency, chooses death before dishonor and sacrifice before safety.—Boston Transcript.

—ON THE CAPTAIN will probably rest for all time a blame that, at the very least, should be shared by a public bitten by the tarantula of high speed and by ship-owners that know, or should know, that hundreds of passengers were lured, and to-day are being lured, into environments where in the event of disaster a fighting chance for life is but a shadowy expectancy.—New York Herald.

WHAT IS TO BE the end of this madness? Is Congress to overlook the warning of the Titanic, or will it call a halt on rapacity and organized murder? The responsibility comes back to the men on Capitol Hill. They can put a stop to the death race through the icebergs. They can force every steamship leaving an American port to provide enough boats for every passenger carried.—Washington Post.

—LET US THOROUGHLY learn the lesson which this great ocean disaster so plainly teaches—a place in a boat or on a raft for every human being on a passenger steamship. The steamship companies that first adopt this policy on their own account will appeal to the patronage of the public. But this is a matter that should not be left to the companies to remedy. There must be law—immediate, drastic law.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

—AFTER THE TRAGIC event it seems criminal that the course was not changed if the new ship was to be driven on at a speed of twenty-one knots. What then is the explanation of her forging through ice-strewn water almost at maximum velocity? Can there be any doubt that the risk was not understood? It is clear enough that the loss of the Titanic and the sacrifice of two-thirds of her passengers and crew was due more to ignorance and misplaced confidence than to criminal carelessness.—New York Sun.

—CAPTAIN SMITH HAD received by wireless messages at least three warnings that icebergs were in his path, from the Touraine, from the Amerika, and from the Mesaba. He had acknowledged with thanks the Mesaba's warning that dead ahead of him lay "much heavy packed ice and great numbers of bergs." Yet straight into the jaws of destruction he steamed at high speed. Captain Smith was not on the bridge at the moment of impact; he had not been there for two hours. Yet he had warned the second officer about ice. Any captain knows what the ice danger is.—New York Times.

The Tonic Qualities of Grape Juice

RICH, ripe, luscious grapes possess, in addition to their deliciousness, wonderful tonic and blood-building qualities. They aid digestion, prevent dyspepsia, increase appetite. Foreign doctors, knowing this, have established grape "cures" where thousands flock yearly at the grape season.

But the simplest way to enjoy these wonderful health qualities is to drink daily

Armour's Grape Juice

Bottled Where the Best Grapes Grow

Made in the splendidly equipped Armour factories, located in the hearts of the famous New York and Michigan Concord grape-growing districts, Armour's Grape Juice conserves all the virtues of the fresh fruit.

Absolutely pure, undiluted and unsweetened, preservation is by sterilization and air-tight bottling.

Thus the rare richness and flavor, the splendid royal color of these finest Concords goes into every bottle.

ARMOUR'S GRAPE JUICE is sold by grocers and druggists, at fountains, buffets and clubs. It is the great family drink—for health and pleasure combined.

If your dealer cannot supply you with Armour's, we will send you a trial dozen pints for $3, express prepaid east of Omaha. Address Armour and Company, Dept. 132, Chicago.

ARMOUR AND COMPANY

You Can Weigh Exactly What You Should Weigh

My pupils are among the most refined, intellectual women of America. They have regained health and good figures and learned how to keep well. Each has given me a few minutes a day in the privacy of her own room to following scientific, hygienic principles of health, prescribed to suit each individual's needs.

No Drugs—No Medicines

My work has grown in favor because results are quick, natural and permanent and because they are scientific and appeal to common sense.

Be well—nothing short of well.

Radiate Health—so that every one with whom you come in contact is permeated with your strong spirit, your wholesome personality—feels better in body and mind for your very presence.

Be Attractive—well groomed.

Improve Your Figure—in other words be at your best. You wield a stronger influence for good, for education, for wholesome right living, if you are attractive and well, graceful and well poised—upright in body as well as in mind—and you are happier.

I want to help every woman to realize that her health lies, to a degree, in her own hands, and that she can reach her ideal in figure and poise.

Judge what I can do for you by what I have done for others.

I think I do not exaggerate when I say I have corrected more Chronic Ailments and built up and reduced more women during the past nine years than any physician—the best physicians are my friends—their wives and daughters are my pupils. I have Reduced about 25,000 women from 10 to 85 lbs. I have rounded out and increased the weight of as many more—all this by strengthening nerves, heart, circulation, lungs vital organs so as to regulate the assimilation of food.

The Simplest Gown looks well on a Figure of Correct Proportion if Carried Well.

Won't you join us?—we will make you and the world better.

I have published a free booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly, and giving other information of vital interest to women. Write for it and I will also tell you about my work. If you are perfectly well and your figure is just what you wish, you may be able to help a dear friend—at least you will help me by your interest in this great movement of health and figure through natural means.

Sit down and write to me NOW. Don't wait—you may forget it.

I have had a wonderful experience, and I should like to tell you about it.

Questions and Answers

C. L., Livingston, Tenn. 1. Christ, speaking to Peter, said: "Upon this rock I will build my church." Did he mean that he had not set up any church heretofore? 2. In John 10: 12, what did the wolf catch?

1. The passage in Matt. 16: 18 to which you refer is one concerning which there has been much controversy. The "rock" does not refer to the man Peter, but to the faith that had been represented in his conversion to Christ as the Son of God and the Saviour of the world. This was to be the church's foundation, against which nothing—not even death or hell—should prevail. The church was then in the process of being founded. The same gift of divine power and authority extended to all the apostles (see Matt. 18: 18). 2. The "wolf" is the enemy of the spiritual flock and is always on the watch to trap the unwary, the weak and the unguarded; consequently, the careless or disloyal shepherd (the hireling) being incompetent to protect his charges, they become an easy prey.

Information, Cobleskill, N. Y. Please explain the doctrine of the "communion of saints" as mentioned in the Apostles' Creed.

There are two definitions of this point of faith in the creed: The Westminster Confession says that all saints are united to Jesus Christ their head by his Spirit, and have fellowship with him in his graces, sufferings, death, resurrection and glory. They have also communion with the Father and with the Holy Spirit and thus receive the sanctifying graces. They have a common union among themselves in love, graces and deeds. They are bound by profession to maintain this holy fellowship, in mutual edification and good works. They have also, through the sacraments and the Word, fellowship with the saints on earth, as living members of Christ, and with the angels (who are ministering spirits). The Catholic view is that the union is one between the church militant (on earth), the church triumphant (in heaven) and the church suffering (in purgatory), the union being upheld by intercession and prayer—thus preparing the way for prayers to the saints in heaven and for the souls in purgatory.

Mrs. S. R. D. Please state where John Wilkes Booth was captured and by whom. Also please state what disposition was made of his remains.

Booth, the assassin of President Lincoln, was shot at Bowling Green, Va., by Sergeant Boston Corbett, one of the pursuing party. The chase had lasted twelve days before Booth was overtaken in a barn where he was hiding. Booth died within a very short time after his arrest. Although the statement is sometimes questioned, it is generally believed that Booth's body was cremated and the ashes carried out to sea and there scattered.

Several readers have written us asking further details as to the origin of Mother's Day. In Northamptonshire, England, some seventy years ago, the third Sunday in Lent was kept as "Mother's Day," anticipating the beautiful memorial festival founded in this country by Miss Anna Jarvis in 1905. Mr. R. J. Rogers, of Santa Cruz, Calif., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that it was always celebrated in his home in England, and all of the boys and girls who were working away from home were expected to go back there and visit mother. The bill of fare for the day was always roast veal and custard. "The last time it was kept in our family," Mr. Rogers writes, "was in 1853."

W. A. S., Detroit, Mich. I belong to a men's Sabbath class and in our last Sunday's lesson our leader astounded me by saying that Christ did not come as a Saviour, but as an example. He said we were our own saviors by complying with the conditions, and that it was not necessary for our salvation that Christ should have died, for people were saved before Christ came. Please answer the following questions: (1) In what sense did Christ come as a Saviour? (2) Was it necessary that Christ should die for our salvation? (3) Why could people not be saved after Christ's time as they were before?

Your leader's remarks were unfortunate and showed that he did not understand the Gospel and was not acquainted with the Scriptures. The message of the New Testament is that Christ has brought salvation by his death. The Christian life and Christian work are a life lived and work done in affectionate gratitude to Christ because he died for us. This is the Gospel: "Christ hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God." Christ is an example, truly, but that was not the chief purpose of his coming; he was a perfect teacher and a perfect example, but he was, most of all, a perfect Saviour, making a perfect atonement for sin. The matter of the atonement was discussed briefly on page 247 of the present volume of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, March 6, 1912. (1) Christ came as a Saviour in the sense that his death makes it possible for the penalty of sin to be remitted, and that his power can keep us from committing sin. (2) It would perhaps be presumptuous to say that God could not have found any other way of bringing salvation to men than to send his Son to die for them, but this is the plan he chose, promised, announced and carried out. (3) There are two directions in which the atonement works: it works toward God, or toward law; and it works toward man. It awakens repentance and leads to faith in God, to love toward him, and gives power for righteousness. Many hold that the benefits of Christ's death were applied to those who lived before his time as well as to those living after. This, however, relates to the mysterious phase of the atonement. But we do know that the story of Calvary makes it easier for men to be good; it wins them to God. It is enough to say that men have less excuse now than before Christ came for staying away from God. It was always the goodness of God that led men to repentance; now that that goodness has been so intensely revealed and emphasized by the death of Christ they should be led more quickly and in greater numbers than before. God never despised the broken and contrite heart. The man who thinks he can be his own savior has an entirely wrong idea of what salvation is. Salvation is a life, salvation is love; and like life and like love, it is a gift. We cannot earn it; but if we are humble and trustful we can receive it.

Reader, Lowell, Mass. 1. Fiction, or work of the imagination, is one of the most valuable features of our modern literature. Some of the world's greatest reforms have had their origin in work of this class. Fiction has its parallel in parable and allegory, which the very earliest writers and teachers employed to emphasize great truths. To take imagination out of literature would leave it barren indeed. 2. We believe that conditions on the Congo have improved in recent years. 3. The preferable translation is that the Lord permitted the heart of Pharaoh to be hardened. Pharaoh was an impious and superstitious ruler, alternately rebelling and submitting, and after promising concessions to the Israelites, he failed to keep his word. He was left to his own evil courses, which resulted in his destruction.

E. L. T., Hydra, Okla. What became of Mary, the mother of Jesus?

What we learn of her, after the crucifixion, is chiefly through tradition. Epiphanius says the rest of her life was probably spent in Jerusalem. Tholuck mentions a tradition that she lived and died in the chamber which was used for the Last Supper. Another tradition says she journeyed to Ephesus with John the "beloved disciple" and died there.

Rev. F. H. Decker, superintendent of the Church House at Providence, has called our attention to a mistake in the statement of the finances of that institution, which was made recently in these columns. We are very glad to correct that error by quoting from a statement forwarded us by Mr. Decker: "Treasurer Nathan Barton's report for the month of January showed that the men who make their home at the institution contributed $1,034 for their board during the month and earned $226.83 in excess of their board through the work furnished through the Church House. Donations of $367.75 were reported. Expenses of $1,803.24 were reported, leaving a balance of $160.18. Assets of $2,380.44 above all liabilities were reported."

M. O., Girard, Kan. 1. This is not a political journal. 2. "Usury" between Israelites was forbidden by the laws of Moses, although it might be taken from strangers. The word means "yield," or "increase," although it is frequently, and justifiably, interpreted as "biting," or "extortion." The practice of usury or money-lending at interest has been condemned repeatedly by the leading councils of the Christian Church, because of its tendency to serious abuse.

Presbyterian, Leaman Place, Pa. Sunday should be regarded in Christian communities as a day upon which all unnecessary labor should cease and when only that which is due to necessity or to mercy should be performed. The case you mention is not one that can be decided by others. It should be taken up conscientiously and in the most liberal spirit by your board and care should be taken not to judge harshly. By all means the man should be given a chance to make good.

J. W., Leaf River, Ill. The passage I. Cor. 7: 35-37 was recently explained in THE MAIL-BAG. Paul was not advocating marriage, since he himself apparently preferred the single state; but he considered it advisable under certain conditions. For himself, he chose to remain unmarried that he might devote his entire energies to his spiritual work.

H. M. G., Friend, Oregon. 1. Many books have been written concerning the mystery of the number of the beast and it has been variously interpreted as referring to the Church of Rome, Antichrist, the false prophet, and "the number of a world given over to judgment." As the passage itself states, it is a deep mystery, only to be solved by spiritual wisdom. 2. "Apocalypse" means the unveiling or manifestation of something secret or hidden.

rs. T. H. F., Dresden, Mo. 1. Are good works on earth rewarded in heaven or in this life? 2. Will there be degrees in heaven?

1. Faith and works must go together. The ith is demonstrated by the works, although orks alone cannot save. We have no saving erit of our own. A life that is unfruitful of od works cannot be pleasing to God; and if is holds true, it logically follows that a life of od works—a fertile life, consecrated to God's ory and the good of man—must be pleasing him. In the parable of the talents, it is early taught that our lives must be fruitful. he barren fig-tree was cursed because of its nfruitfulness. Still, it should not be forgotten at a man's good deeds alone cannot save. alvation is the free gift of God. 2. That there re degrees in heaven we may infer from vari- us passages. Jesus speaks of those who will t on thrones; Paul in I. Cor. 15: 40, 41 con- eys the idea that there are degrees in the uture life, and in II. Cor. 12: 2 he speaks urther of heavenly degrees. See also Dan. 2: 3, which marks a special distinction to hose who have been soul-winners.

Mrs. W. B. D., Diggs, Va. 1. See paragraph MAIL-BAG of July 5, 1911, regarding recog- ition of parents in heaven. 2. In Acts 1: 1, he writer refers to the "former treatise," mean- ng the first account, narrative or discourse on he subject of our Lord's last days on earth nd his ascension. This "former treatise" is resumably the third Gospel to which the Acts which are believed to have been written by Luke) are the appropriate sequel. Theophilus may have been the name of some associate of he writer, or it may simply be a name chosen s applicable to any Christian, since the word itself means "Friend of God."

. H., Springwater, Ore. Can you throw any light on the prophecies of Enoch men- tioned in the Epistle of Jude?

Enoch is one of the apocalyptic books of arly religious literature. It is not included in ny of the modern collections, although it was n existence as late as the seventeenth century, when Bruce the traveler found copies of it in Abyssinia, in the Ethiopic language. It was not admitted to the Jewish canon. Bruce's opy contained 108 chapters, comprising the revelations of Enoch the seer respecting the uture judgment of the world and addressing both the righteous and rebellious sinners. It also contained some account of the fall of the angels, of the judgment that fell upon the giants of antediluvian days, of the seer's jour- ney through earth and lower heaven com- panioned with an angel, of the future blessings of the righteous and of the coming of the Mes- siah. There is much in the book that shows wide acquaintance with astronomy. Enoch is supposed to have lived in a time of great dis- tress and persecution, when the faith of the godly was shaken by their troubles. The book conveys the belief in a general resurrection and in rewards and punishments. Your other ques- tion will be answered by mail.

Miscellaneous

Interested Reader. There is no such passage in the Bible.

K. N., St. Louis, Mo. There is no passage on the subject of race suicide in the Scriptures. Children, however, are spoken of many times as a blessing when rightly trained by godly parents, and the reverse under evil conditions.

C. J., Leivasy, W. Va. In I. Chron. 18: 10, 11, the connection is clear. David dedicated to the temple the gifts he received from Tou, king of Hamath. This was simply an incident in the wars of David. In your further Bible reading (you have already read the Word through eight times) you would find a commentary very useful.

L. B. K., Philadelphia, Pa. It is easy to fall into the error of judging others according to outward appearances. Perhaps the person you mention may repent of his associations and may realize that his business is one that does not comport with the Christian profession; but that is a matter concerning which no one should judge hastily. Jesus himself sat at meat with publicans and sinners. Paul, who became "all things to all men" to win souls, did not draw the line as some modern Christians do. You can help a man by friendly advice and counsel, but hardly by condemnation and exclusion. Another point is that even a man engaged in a doubtful business may be at heart a Christian, and only waiting an opportunity to forsake that which degrades or brutalizes men. Tem- perance, the "golden mean," is enjoined in Scripture; but the injunction applies to all things, and not to one thing only. See John 2: 1-11, and Matt. 26: 29.

Helping China's Famine Orphans

ONE of the saddest features in the China famine has been the suffering of the children. In many cases parents have sold their children to obtain food for the rest of the family. Boys and girls have been sold for prices from eighty cents to two dollars. It is to save the children from such a fate as this or from quick starvation that the missionaries have taken many parentless and neglected little ones under their care. They are now sheltering, feeding, clothing and training 2,000, of whom 700 are unprovided for. It is for these that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is appealing to its friends and readers. Send your gift to THE CHINA FAMINE ORPHAN FUND, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, and help to save one little Chinese child. Madam—Are You Serving Your Family Steamed Beans or Baked Beans?

BEANS that are merely steamed and boiled cannot possess the enticing flavor that baking gives.

It is real oven-baking that develops the rich, appetizing aroma which greets you the mo- ment a tin of Heinz Baked Beans is opened.

—And good! There never were beans more delicious since New England's famous bean-pot first gave up its savory contents. They conform to the standard set for all the

57 Varieties

Every Heinz Baked Bean is baked through and through—every particle made tender—mouth-melting.

Topped with tender strips of choicest pork and permeated with Heinz pure Tomato Sauce—all the zest and flavor of real tomatoes —caught the instant the luscious, red-ripe fruit, is picked from the vines.

Heinz Baked Beans

(Oven-Baked)

And Heinz Baked beans contain far less water than boiled and steamed beans—far more of strength-build- ing elements.

There are four kinds of Heinz Baked Beans:

Heinz Baked Beans with Pork and Tomato Sauce.

Heinz Plain Baked Pork and Beans (without Tomato Sauce)

Heinz Vegetarian Baked Beans (without Pork)

Heinz Baked Red Kidney Beans.

THE "TITANIC" INVESTIGATION

The Titanic, Mr. Franklin said, cost about £1,500,000 sterling ($7,500,000). He did not know whether she had had searchlights. Since the disaster, the company had decided to equip all its vessels with boats, life-rafts and belts sufficient for all on board, crew and passengers included. He ended with the statement that the only reason why an effort should have been made to get the Titanic survivors away to England was that it was the company's duty to see that they were sent back home expeditiously, for their own protection. This was in answer to Senator Smith, who asked why it should have been attempted to get them out of the country and away from the committee's jurisdiction.

On Tuesday, April 23, Major A. G. Peuchen of Toronto, a rescued passenger, was a leading witness. He said if the lookout men had been supplied with glasses, the disaster would have been averted. In the lifeboat in which he escaped there was one woman among the rowers. They heard the sound of three explosions on the Titanic; then the lights went out. Every one on the lifeboat then heard dreadful and long-continued cries for help. None could have lived in that icy sea more than an hour. The witness read a statement criticizing the company's methods, and declaring that caution would have averted the calamity.

Herbert J. Pitman, third officer of the Titanic, told of the fire and boat drills on the big steamer, in which only a few men participated. After the collision, he met Ismay on deck, who told him to get the women and children to the boats. Ismay personally helped. Pitman commanded one boat with forty passengers. They had no lights. When some distance off he saw the ship settle by the head and then suddenly go "straight down." He heard several explosions as she went under. Then he heard crying, shouting and moaning from those in the water several hundred yards away. It was like one long, continuous moan, which continued over an hour. He told his men to pull back and try to save a few more, but the passengers in his boat demurred, and said it was madness, and that it would simply add another forty to the list of lost. So he yielded, and his boat, which could have held more, was allowed to drift within easy reach of the drowning, yet making no attempt to aid them. This part of the witness's story made a painful impression on the committee. While lying on their oars, he and his boat crew saw a light—a white light—on the horizon, but did not follow it. Officer Boxhall, one of the previous witnesses on Monday, had testified that there had been a strange ship in the vicinity of the Titanic, which failed to give aid. Pitman said he heard later that one had passed, but he knew nothing of it. He practically admitted that the Titanic at the time of collision was going at the greatest speed of her trip, in the face of the warnings of ice.

Frederick Fleet, a sailor on the lost steamer, told of his watch as lookout in the "crow's-nest." He was in it when the collision took place. Officers Murdock and Pitman were on the bridge. Fleet at 11:30 P.M. reported a black mass of ice ahead; he had previously reported ice ahead, but when he saw the huge berg he sounded three bells and telephoned to the bridge. The collision didn't alarm him; he thought it a "narrow shave." He had no glasses for the lookout although he had asked for them, and if he had had them he could have seen the iceberg sooner and would have had time to get out of the way. The ship did not stop after the bridge got the telephone signal; she did not stop until she passed the iceberg, although the wheel was put to starboard.

That Corn Will Go for Good

It will be ended forever in 48 hours, if you use a Blue-jay plaster.

The pain ends instantly when you apply it. Then the B & B wax gently loosens the corn. In two days it comes out, root and all.

No soreness, no discomfort. Nothing else known does what Blue-jay does.

That's why millions use it. You will never let corns disturb you when you find this out.

Nor will you ever pare them. Paring takes off just the top of the corn. And a slip of the blade means infection—sometimes a dangerous one.

The right way—the easy way—is to end them completely with this famous Blue-jay plaster. Prove it today.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

Kathleen Norris

HAVE YOU READ "MOTHER"

By Kathleen Norris

MARGARET SANGSTER says: "'Mother' is the sweetest, holiest, tenderest and blessedest word in the language. No other name means quite so much to hearth and home. Kathleen Norris had a happy thought one day, and it crystallized into a happy book that came out at a happy hour. She named her book Mother. On the day that the book drifted out of space into my hands it was read through at a sitting and laid down with a sigh. The sigh was an expression at once of extreme satisfaction and of regret that the story was not longer. In this charming book there is concealed the gist of many sermons. Could it be placed in the hands of every engaged couple, of all the young married folk, of the people generally, poorer and richer, striving, thriving, aspiring and attaining, who compose this nation, its motive and message, understood and received, would uplift us to a vantage ground and a higher plane than any to which we have as yet attained. Mother, by Kathleen Norris, is a human document. The story is unpretentious and, if I may coin a word, is singularly homey. Reading it one says to herself, 'Yes, this is true. I have seen it, I have been in a situation like this, or I have been a spectator.' This dear story-teller is describing precisely situations and conditions that we meet in daily life, in city and country, wherever people live and love and struggle."

Mother is now in its seventh edition and is rapidly becoming one of the best sellers in the bookstores at $1.00 a copy. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD thought so well of this book that it induced the publishers to print a special edition exclusively for CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers.

OUR SPECIAL OFFER—We will send the book, Mother, postpaid, as a reward to any subscriber who will induce a friend or neighbor, not now on our list, to subscribe for The Christian Herald for One Year, at $1.50.

OR—We will send the book, Mother, postpaid, to any subscriber with renewal of subscription for One Year for $2.00.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City

4,000 Carloads Wanted

Up to this writing, orders have come to us for over 4,000 carloads of Reo the Fifths. Six cities want trainload lots

By R. E. Olds, Designer

My Greatest Success

In all the 25 years I have spent building cars I never saw a demand like that for Reo the Fifth.

It is the season's sensation.

Six cities ask for shipments in trainload lots—trains of forty carloads. These are New York, Boston, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Portland and Kansas City.

About one thousand dealers, in a thousand towns, have already ordered these cars.

After 25 Years

This comes after men, for a quarter century, have driven cars I built.

I told these men that Reo the Fifth embodies the best I know.

I said that it marks my limit, after a lifetime's experience.

And the first announcement brought 12,000 orders from men who have faith in me.

No Undue Haste

In the stress of this demand no undue haste is permitted. I stand here and insist that every car shall be a credit to my reputation.

The parts of each car are ground over and over, until we get utter exactness.

Each car in the making must pass a thousand inspections. Countless parts are discarded because of slight imperfections.

Each lot of steel is analyzed. Engines are tested for 48 hours. Completed cars are submitted to long and radical test.

The bodies are finished with 17 coats. Not a detail is being slighted.

We could increase our sales $1,000,000 this spring by a little less care in production. But we shall not omit that care.

Not for a Season

Reo the Fifth is not built for one season. We count on each car selling 20 cars in the future.

For this car comes close to finality. Men will never be able to greatly improve on it. This factory can never say, "Here is a new model, much better than Reo the Fifth."

With this car I lay down the arduous cares of designing. I end 25 years of ceaseless improvement. I am perfectly content to be judged by this car, whatever may come in the future.

That's why I am watching every car that goes out. We can never claim to better our best, after all this experience. So the future of the Reo depends on this car's performance.

New Center Control

The Year's Greatest Improvement

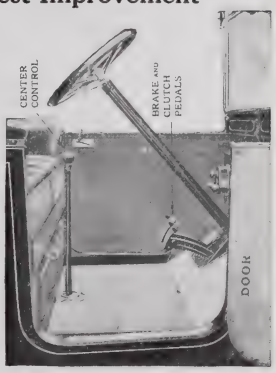
The new center control in Reo the Fifth marks the greatest step of the year in designing. It solves the last great problem in motor car engineering.

There are no side levers to block one of the front doors. There is no reaching for the brake or the gear lever.

All the gear shifting is done by this center cane-handle. It is done with the right hand, and done by moving this handle only three inches in each of four directions.

Both brakes are operated by foot pedals. One pedal also operates the clutch. There was never a control so handy, so simple.

This arrangement permits of the left side drive, heretofore possible in electric cars only. The driver sits, as he should sit, close to passing cars, and on the up side of the road.



Price Still $1,055

The initial price of this car is still being continued, though subject to instant advance.

This is one feature, I fear, which must be changed before long. Any advance in materials must be added to the price, and that advance is imminent, I think.

I repeat this to avoid any misunderstanding. We shall not advance our price because of over-demand, though that would be easily possible. This car would be cheap at $1,250—cheaper than any rival.

Added price, when it comes, will be solely due to added cost of production. Our margin is now at the minimum.

Happy Cozy Corner Days

It matters not how strait the gate, how charged with punishments the scroll; I am the master of my fate; I am the captain of my soul.
W. E. Henley.

HERO-WORSHIP

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS: We talked last week here in the Cozy Corner about heroes and bravery and high purpose. Do you remember? And I had planned this week to take up the thread where we left it off and say something further about these things in order that we might all think more and more about unselfishness and chivalry. But what is there left to say at this time about other heroes or heroines in the face of that brave company by whose greatness of soul all heroism has been exalted?

In the face of such chivalry, such high standards of manhood and womanhood as were shown by the men and women who perished on the Titanic, our young lives must take on a loftier hero-worship, and no day should go by without our paid tribute to the world's new standard of courage and high calling.

We can begin now to pack our lives with pluck, to police the little events of our days with unselfishness and determination, and to be braver boys and girls no matter what.

Remember that each bit of heroism and self-forgetfulness counts, and even though we shall many times fail in our efforts, believe me, that little by little and day after day, we can transform into our lives many of the lessons of honor and unselfishness that we are hearing on all sides to-day. We must always remember this: Heroes are ever leaders of heroes, and nothing so fires the hearts of men as heroism in others. Courage, like a flaming torch, moved over that great ship's company; the cruel crime of negligence was forgotten by souls too great to remember, while a new glory flamed up: a restored glory of heroism upon which the whole of the modern world might well be founded. At the very start, when the doomed ship struck its death-blow, superhuman bravery and self-forgetfulness were necessary if any lives were to be saved; and that we can share again the fine thrill of heart that called those men together in one dauntless purpose to serve and to graciously give up their lives for others is greater inspiration than all our hero-worship has ever done for us before. How good it feels to be so sure in our hearts that that gallant company, by right of its fine spirit, found its direct and simple way to God; Gentlemen unafraid.

And little children, shift your standards from good giants and fairyland princes to men; brave, true, able and unselfish men, the very heroes that your brothers and fathers would ever love to be, with you, dears, to inspire them along the way with great-heartedness and fortitude.

Right Ways to Tie Knots

CONSIDERING the many uses to which knot-tying is indispensable, every boy should know how to tie at least several varieties of knots. Yet it has been recently estimated that only one boy in seventy-five is able to make knots—even bad ones. There are right and wrong ways to tie knots just as there are right and wrong ways of doing everything else, and since it may often happen that our own life or the lives of others may depend on the correct setting of a knot we had best learn promptly how to tie some common varieties.

The Bowline

The Reef-Knot

The Sheet-Bend

The principal characteristics of the right kind of knots are these: They must hold under any amount of strain, and must always be easy to undo.

The bowline knot is a loop-knot that will not slip. It is easily understood how to tie it by looking at the illustration and practicing with a good stout rope. The reef-knot is for tying two ropes together. This is one of the best and simplest of knots. It cannot slip and is always easy to untie. The sheet-bend is another useful loop-knot and is much used in ambulance work or in lowering a person or anything that is heavy from a building. It cannot slip and will hold the full strain of the pull of the rope. Next week we shall be giving several more of the simplest and best variety of knots.

Special May Prize Notice

For best Verse or Prose, not exceeding 250 words, sent to the Cozy Corner Aunt before May 20:

First prize: Gun-metal watch for boy or girl.

Second prize: Large box-kite (boy), a gold ring (girl), and twenty smaller prizes in order of merit.

THE HEROES

Say not they die, those martyr souls
Whose life is winged with purpose fine;
Who leave us, pointing to the goals,
Who learn to conquer and resign.

Such cannot die; they vanquish time,
And fill the world with growing light,
Making the human life sublime
With memories of their sacred might.

MALCOLM QUIN.

Good-Night Verse

What is man, that thou art mindful of him? Thou madest him a little lower than the angels, thou crownest him with glory and honor. O Lord our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth!—Ps. 8: 4, 5, 9.

Ever lovingly,

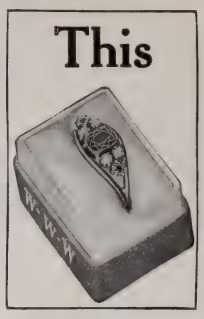
No Other Gift Like This



NOTHING ever gave man or woman more pleasure than the gift of a solid gold gem-set ring. There's a charm in a sparkling stone or in one of exquisite color. Can you think of a thing that adds more to smart dress? Does anything else that you know really take the place of a beautiful ring? Do you know that today you can get gem-set rings with the stones guaranteed secure?

W-W-W Rings

Guaranteed Settings

When you buy a "W-W-W" Ring you are so insured against the loss of the stone. If it comes out and is lost—no matter how long after purchase—we give you a new stone, free. This applies to all stones save diamonds.

But this isn't the only advantage. "W-W-W" Rings are the most beautiful rings in existence. We are ring specialists. We make nothing else. Our 3,000 designs are exclusive.

Our "Invention"

All "W-W-W" Rings are standard value—solid gold.

Yet they cost no more than rings of cheaper quality.

We call the safe-set ring our "invention" because we discovered that rings could be permanently set by taking extreme—almost unnecessary—care in the setting. We invented no special clamp or method. It is just a question of perfect material, expert workmanship and rigid inspection.

Give "W-W-W" Rings for birthdays, anniversaries, weddings, graduations, and on other special occasions. Wear your birthstone. Some people consider them "lucky."

"W-W-W" Rings are sold in every city and town of importance. A set-ring is now an investment for which we, White, Wile & Warner, are the security. There are beautiful "W-W-W" Rings at $2 or more. We set all kinds of stones.

Go to Your Jeweler

He will gladly show "W-W-W" Rings.

If he hasn't these rings, send up his name and we'll see that you are supplied.

Write for "W-W-W" Catalog. It tells all about rings. It's worth reading.

Kaleidophane

Makes art glass out of plain glass

It is a thin, translucent material, easily applied to any pane of glass without removing it. Reproduces perfectly all the rich coloring and beautiful designs found in stained glass at a fraction of the cost. Will not fade from light or washing. Made in many patterns, appropriate for homes, hotels, cafes and other business places. Also churches, clubs and public buildings. Use Kaleidophane wherever privacy is desired. Shuts out the view but admits the light. More economical than curtains or shades for transoms, cellar or bathroom windows and side windows in stores and offices. Costs little and very easy to put on. The Best Securities

In a recent article we endeavored to explain the difference between "listed" and "unlisted securities," and it was pointed out that intrinsically the one might be just as good as the other, and that the fact of listing, that is, placing in the list of securities dealt in by the New York Stock Exchange, in itself neither added to nor detracted from the actual worth of the thing so placed. But, if there were not some benefit in listing a security, why should corporations seek to have it done, and why should that particular exchange insist on its being done before it permitted such stock or bonds to be bought or sold on its floor? In the first place, it has been shown that such securities are more sought out by banks as forms of investment, and hence they are more easily convertible; in the second place, the companies issuing such securities, by the very act of listing them at the exchange, place their books, and so their sources of revenue, open to the inspection of the enrolled brokers who deal in them, and this is certainly a great point with those who are looking for the best.

Other Sources of Information

While the listed corporations must make annual reports to the exchange, they may at any time be called on to make a special report showing the immediate state of affairs. But the investor, even the small investor, for whom the best is none too good, should himself be familiar with the doings of the companies in which his money is placed. It is the rule for these companies to send their annual reports to all stockholders of record, and if these are not forthcoming they should be asked for, and when secured they should be gone over and carefully compared with the preceding report, so as to ascertain if there has been an increase or a falling off in the net annual receipts.

Although one not a stockholder of record may not be able to get access to the report of a company whose stock is not listed, it should be generally known, though it is not, that, according to a ruling of the present Secretary of the Treasury, all desirable information pertaining to the companies whose securities are listed in the New York Stock Exchange shall be public property and accessible to all interested inquirers. Such information, duly sworn to, is now on file in the Treasury Department at Washington, and a copy may be had on proper application.

In addition to this, the information in the daily reports of the money markets in the daily papers will serve to keep the investor posted as to the state of his holdings. But while the sources of accurate information are necessarily limited, the fountains of misinformation are ever on tap, and the unwary is apt to be saturated, if not submerged, by them. Once a man is known to be an investor, or is regarded as a prospective investor, he will find that much of his mail consists of circular letters from more or less responsible traders, prospectuses of new ventures eloquent with great promises, and other matters purporting to give inside information, meant to be particularly alluring; and, unfortunately, it too often is.

Another thing that should be guarded against by the investor is the "tip." The tip purports to be information of the most exclusive and valuable kind. The man who whispers the tip knows that a certain security, for reasons that he can never divulge, is going to boom skyward in a few days, and that the fortunate man who buys now will be on Easy Street in no time. We have never known a man to make money on a tip given by a comparative stranger, but we have known many to lose. The man who gives the tip is usually the tout of some concern anxious to boom a security so that money may be made on the rise and an equal amount secured from the inevitable fall. Often, to excite the market, the same tipster will advise one-half of those to whom he gives his "secret" to buy and the other half to sell, exciting in this way an interest that draws the unthinking crowd, as leaking molasses draws flies. At a time like this, the unskilled investor, before risking a penny, will seek the advice of the man with training to guide and a reputation to uphold.

A Question of Choice

As between a promising stock and a good bond, there are those who prefer to invest in the stock, but they are usually rich men who are looking for an increase of values, and who can afford to put their securities into their safes and wait. As between the two, we should advise the bond to the small investor. The stock, as has been shown, is simply an equity, while the bond is a promise to pay, and, unless everything goes to pieces, it must be paid when it matures. The good bond, no matter how dead business may be, has always a reasonable selling value, because it has in itself the pledge of ultimate redemption, but not so the stock. The company issuing the bond must redeem it at maturity, but stock never matures, and its earning power is always conditional.

The schemer, having a worthless stock on which he aims to realize a large profit, knowing that the average investor prefers a listed stock, will often in his advertisement state: "This stock is regularly listed, a fact that insures it an active market." Now, there are responsible exchanges in all our large cities, and they make it a point to list good securities, after due examination, but on investigation it may be found that the security that the schemer is anxious to sell has not the approval of a reliable stock exchange, but is listed in some out-of-the-way exchange, which is usually organized for the one purpose of assisting the swindler.

The cautious investor might infer, from what has just been said, that two-thirds of the world are out to plunder the other third, but this would be a wrong conclusion. A great majority of the bankers and professional financiers of the country to-day stand high among the men of veracity and unflinching integrity. They are even more anxious than are their customers to bring the swindlers to justice. Because many burglaries are committed in a town, we should not leap to the conclusion that the people of that particular town are in sympathy with that form of enterprise.

A Reasonable Per Cent.

While it is quite natural that a man should desire the largest possible returns from his money, he should ever bear in mind that there is a limit of safety and that this is always exceeded when the promised interest or dividend exceeds the legal rate. Savings banks, as a rule, pay 4 per cent., and until a better opportunity comes along, no better place for money can be found. But opportunities to get the best are constantly presenting themselves to the man who is wide-awake. There are securities having in them a promise of 4½ or 5 per cent. that are practically as good and safe as the gilt-edged two per cents. of the United States Government.

In advising our readers to get the best, the very best, it should be borne in mind and constantly emphasized that such securities are never brought to your home by smooth-tongued agents, against whom, at the risk of many repetitions, we cannot too strongly caution the reader. An authority on this subject declares that, within the past fifteen years, twenty-eight thousand companies have sent their agents out to sell their securities among the unwary. These companies have vanished, so have some one thousand million dollars of credulous people's money. Get the best, we repeat, and in doing so your name will not figure in the list of victims.

BUILDING FOOD

To Bring the Babies Around.

When a little human machine (or a large one) goes wrong, nothing is so important as the selection of food to bring it around again.

"My little baby boy fifteen months old had pneumonia, then came brain fever, and no sooner had he got over these than he began to cut teeth and, being so weak, he was frequently thrown into convulsions," says a Colorado mother.

"I decided a change might help, so took him to Kansas City for a visit. When we got there he was so very weak when he would cry he would sink away and seemed like he would die.

"When I reached my sister's home she said immediately that we must feed him Grape-Nuts and, although I had never used the food, we got some and for a few days just gave him the juice of Grape-Nuts and milk. He got stronger so quickly we were soon feeding him the Grape-Nuts itself and in a wonderfully short time he fattened right up and became strong and well.

"That showed me something worth knowing and, when later on my little girl came, I raised her on Grape-Nuts and she is a strong, healthy baby and has been. You will see from the little photograph I send you what a strong, chubby youngster the boy is now, but he didn't look anything like that before we found this nourishing food. Grape-Nuts nourished him back to strength when he was so weak he couldn't keep any other food on his stomach." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

All children can be built to a more sturdy and healthy condition upon Grape-Nuts and cream. The food contains the elements nature demands, from which to make the soft gray filling in the nerve centres and brain. A well fed brain and strong, sturdy nerves absolutely insure a healthy body.

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

FULFILLING THE LAW*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IN THE lesson we are to study today Jesus is still sitting upon the Mount of Beatitudes talking to his twelve apostles and to the multitude that has gathered around him.

Jesus said: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets. I came not to destroy, but to fulfil." Evidently there were some unfriendly critics of Jesus among the throng that had gathered, some Scribes and Levites who were scrupulous about their interpretations of the law and their additions to it. The law itself has been called "the substance of all relative duty—the royal law" (James 2: 8 and Rom. 13: 6); also it has been said that "never till our Lord came down to teach did men effectually and widely exemplify it in their practice." All this is true because "the law is founded on the eternal distinctions between right and wrong—distinctions strong and irremovable as the granite bases of the world" (Farrar).

Jesus said: "Till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass away from the law, till all things be accomplished." That is, there should be not the smallest change in God's law, not so much as by a small mark (jot) that is to be compared with the crossing of a t, or the dotting of an i. The Scribes were the authorized copyists of the law, and none knew so well as they what Jesus meant when he said not one jot or tittle should be taken from the law.

Jesus said: "Whosoever, therefore, shall break one of the least of these commandments, and shall teach men so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven." There are people who think it quite meritorious to defy the laws of the land, and those who do this are generally breakers of God's laws as well. They make of themselves a combination of atheists and anarchists, enemies of the universe and the state. The false teachers who subvert law and order are not great, as they seem to themselves to be. They are the smallest of men, "least" of all upon the earth, for "the kingdom of heaven" of which Jesus spoke does not mean heaven the abode of the blessed, for false teachers can have no part in that. What we must understand Jesus to have said was that false teachers were the smallest, weakest men in the church.

Jesus said: "Whosoever shall do and teach them shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." What a wonderful reward is thus put upon the work of the teacher! In another place in the Bible we read: "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever" (Dan. 12: 3). Blessed is the opportunity of the teacher.

The old law said, "Thou shalt not kill." But Jesus showed that in order to fulfil that law one must control his temper, because anger often leads to murder. Jesus also warned his hearers against vituperation, because that leads to murder. The consciousness of a wrong done to another incites to murder, for none are so relentless as those who are themselves unjust, and so Jesus said: "Be reconciled to thy brother," and do it before you can expect to be reconciled before God.

Love Fulfilling the Law

At a later date than when Christ preached the Sermon on the Mount he said: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the great and the first commandment." And he added, "A second like unto it is this: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments the whole law hangeth, and the prophets" (Matt. 22: 37-40).

The passage selected for the Golden Text says: "He that loveth his neighbor hath fulfilled the law." That is the way the apostle Paul wrote it (Rom. 13: 8). If we compare it with what Jesus said, it will be seen to be a half truth, like one-half of a hinge and the other half lacking. And so we must not take that text as the whole thing, but must connect it with what Paul wrote about loving God (I. Cor. 2: 9-16). To love God is to fulfil the first four commandments; to love thy neighbor is to fulfil the last six commandments; therefore to love God and to love man is the fulfilling of the whole law.

How Christ Fulfilled the Law

After Jesus had been raised from the dead, he said to his eleven disciples, "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28: 18).

The prophet Micah said he should be born in Bethlehem (Micah. 5: 2). "And when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the king, there came wise men from the east; . . . and when they were come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary his mother, and fell down and worshiped him," etc. (Matt. 2: 1, 11).

The prophets said he should derive his descent from King David. "And there shall come forth a shoot out of the stock of Jesse (father of David), . . . and the Spirit of Jehovah shall rest upon him, . . . and righteousness shall be the girdle of his waist, and faithfulness the girdle of his loins" Isa. 11: 1-10). And when Jesus was upon earth multitudes hailed him as "Thou Son of David" (Matt. 21: 9). Blind men called upon him as the Son of David to open their eyes (Mark 10: 47, also Matt. 9: 27). As to the righteousness and faithfulness of Jesus we are told: "He was tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin" (Heb. 4: 15).

The prophet Isaiah said that he would open the eyes of the blind and make the deaf hear, and comfort the sorrowing (Isa. 29: 18). And Jesus, as he stood in the synagogue at Nazareth, said: "This day is this Scripture fulfilled in your ears" (Luke 4: 21). And speedily he set about the work he had come from heaven to do. His healing began, not in Nazareth, because he was rejected there, but in Capernaum, where in one day he healed a demoniac, cured Peter's wife's mother of a fever, and healed the multitude sick of divers diseases who were brought to him, filling the street in front of Peter's house (Luke 4: 31-41).

The prophet Zechariah said: "Behold, thy King cometh unto thee, . . . lowly, and riding upon an ass, upon a colt the foal of an ass" (Zech. 9: 9). And Jesus when he was preparing for his triumphal entry into Jerusalem directed two of his disciples to go and find a colt tied whereon yet never man sat, and when they had loosed him, to bring him thither (Luke 19: 29-35). And they set Jesus thereon, and he started for Jerusalem, a multitude going before and spreading their clothes in the way, and others following with waving palm branches, crying out, "Hosanna in the highest" (Matt. 21: 7-9).

The prophet Isaiah said he should be despised and rejected of men (Isa. 53: 3). As we read the account of the life of Jesus on earth, we learn how the Scribes and Pharisees were continually hounding him, and how the chief rulers procured false witnesses against him that they might induce the Roman governor to condemn him to death (Luke 23: 1-2).

Isaiah said he should be "taken from prison and from judgment" (Isa. 53: 8). We read how Pilate ordered him out of the prison and condemned him to be crucified (Matt. 27: 11-26).

The prophet said: "He made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death" (Isa. 53: 9). We read that there were two thieves crucified with him, one on the right hand and the other on the left (Matt. 27: 38). He did make his grave with the rich, for Joseph, a rich man of Arimathea, came to Pilate, and begged the body of Jesus, and then he wrapped it in a clean linen cloth, and laid it in his own new tomb (Matt. 27: 57-60).

The prophets said: "He will swallow up death in victory" (Isa. 25: 8); also "O, grave, I will be thy destruction" (Hosea 13: 14). And when Jesus had come out of his grave alive, after three days, he told his friends they were "slow of heart to believe all that the prophets had spoken" (Luke 24: 25).

The Psalmist with prophetic voice said: "Thou hast ascended on high, thou hast led captivity captive" (Ps. 68: 18). And we are thrilled as we read how those on Mount Olivet beheld while he was taken up; and a cloud received him out of their sight (Acts 1: 9).

Let us now consider how Jesus fulfilled the law:

1. When eight days old he was circumcised (Luke 2: 21; Ex. 12: 13).

2. When forty days old he was redeemed in the temple as the first-born (Ex. 13: 13; Luke 2: 22).

3. When twelve years old he became "a son of the law" (Luke 2: 42).

4. He was subject to his parents (Luke 2: 51; Deut. 21: 18-20).

5. He entered upon his ministry when thirty years of age. According to the law that was the age when priests entered on their office (Num. 4: 3).

6. He was baptized, saying: "Thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness," which was as if he had said, "Thus do I pledge myself to the whole righteousness of the law, thus symbolically do I enter on and engage to fulfil it all" (Bible Commentary).

7. He resisted temptation, using the sword of the law (Matt. 4: 1-10; Deut. 8: 3; Deut. 6: 16; Deut. 6: 13).

8. Jesus taught and preached in the synagogue on the Sabbath Day—the Jewish Sabbath (Matt. 9: 35; Luke 4: 16; Lev. 19: 3; Lev. 26: 2).

9. Jesus memorized the law, probably as a child, for it was the Jewish custom for children at four years of age to begin the study of the law. (See in Red Letter Bible the large number of quotations Jesus made from the Old Testament.)

10. In his death Jesus fulfilled the law of the sin-offerings. (Lev. 1.)

"If any man serve me, let him follow me." We find these words of Jesus in John 12: 26. Jesus' words, "Follow me," call us to earnest deeds. Like him we should be always in haste but never in a hurry. "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" (Luke 2: 49.) We should make our work a delight, entering upon it with a good appetite, for Jesus said: "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work" (John 4: 34). Like him we should walk in the power of the thought that our working time is short, and the night cometh when no man can work. Like him we should work with that enthusiasm which the world often mistakes for madness, as it exclaims, "He is beside himself" (Mark 3: 21).

"Really a Magic Bath"

—that is what one woman said after her first experience with Diamond Dyes.

And every woman in the world who knows, thinks the same thing.

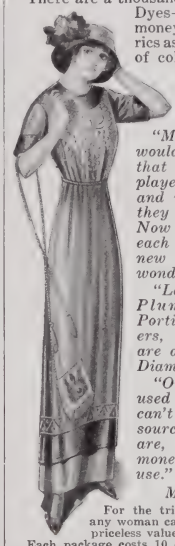
There are a thousand uses for Diamond Dyes—and each one saves money. New life to fabrics as well as new beauty of colorings must result from their use.



Another enthusiastic Chicago woman writes:

"My friends never would believe the part that Diamond Dyes played in my wardrobe and in my home until they had tried them. Now we try to outdo each other in finding new things for these wonder-workers to do.

"Laces, Trimmings, Plumes, Draperies, Portières, Couch Covers, and even Rugs, are among our biggest Diamond Dye successes.

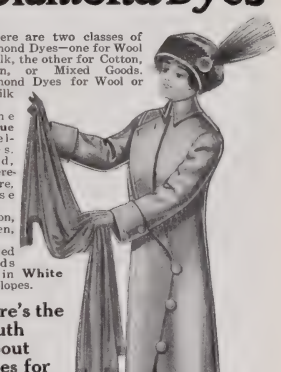
"One who has never used Diamond Dyes can't realize what a source of beauty they are, and how easily money is saved by their use." (Signed)

Mrs. George Allwyn

For the trifling sum of 10 cents any woman can learn for herself the priceless value of Diamond Dyes.

Each package costs 10 cents—and each is the strongest argument for the use of Diamond Dyes that ever was made.

Diamond Dyes



There are two classes of Diamond Dyes—one for Wool or Silk, the other for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods. Diamond Dyes for Wool or Silk now come in Blue envelopes. And, as heretofore, those for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods are in White envelopes.

Here's the Truth About Dyes for Home Use

Our experience of over thirty years has proven that no one dye will successfully color every fabric.

There are two classes of fabrics—animal fibre fabrics and vegetable fibre fabrics:

Wool and Silk are animal fibre fabrics. Cotton and Linen are vegetable fibre fabrics. "Union" or "Mixed" goods are 60% to 80% Cotton—so must be treated as vegetable fibre fabrics.

Vegetable fibres require one class of dye, and animal fibres another and radically different class of dye. As proof, we call attention to the fact that manufacturers of woolen goods use one class of dye, while manufacturers of cotton goods use an entirely different class of dye.

Do Not Be Deceived

For these reasons we manufacture one class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, and another class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Wool or Silk, so that you may obtain the very best results on EVERY fabric.

REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods.

AND REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Wool or Silk, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Wool or Silk.

Diamond Dyes are sold at the uniform price of 10c. per package.

Valuable Books and Samples Free

Send us your dealer's name and address, tell us whether or not he sells Diamond Dyes. We will then send you that famous book of helps, the Diamond Dyes Annual, a copy of the Direction Book, and 36 samples of Dyed Cloth—Free.

THE MOONLIT STREAM

No-Rim-Cut Tires—10% Oversize

Our Average Profit is 8½%

When one maker of anything outsells every rival—reaches the topmost place—it is well to know the reason why.

It means that more people approve his creation than anything else of its kind.

It means that the maker, in some way, has accomplished what other's haven't.

And the chances are you would join the majority, knowing what they know.

When the article in question involves big yearly expense, the facts are worth looking up.

Goodyear No-Rim-Cut tires now hold the topmost place. They far outsell all rivals.

In the past 24 months the demand has increased by over 500 per cent.

Over one million of these tires have been tested, on some 200,000 cars.

The demand today—after all that experience—is three times larger than one year ago.

That astounding record—rarely excelled in all the history of business—marks a tire, Mr. Motorist, which you ought to know.

Ten Years Spent Getting Ready

The success of this tire is a sudden sensation. But we began to perfect it 13 years ago.

We started with the idea that he who gives most will get most.

So we surrounded ourselves with experts—the ablest men we could find. And we told them to secure the maximum mileage, without any regard to expense.

It was years before we approached tire perfection. It was ten years from the start before tire buyers realized what the Goodyear concern had done. Then came this avalanche of trade.

Mileage Tests

To learn facts quickly we did two things.

We put Goodyear tires on thousands of taxicabs—where mileage is known, where conditions are arduous, where comparisons are quickly made.

And we built in our shops a tire testing machine. There four tires at a time are constantly worn out, under all road conditions, while meters record the mileage.

Thus we compared every fabric and formula, every grade of material, every method of wrapping and vulcanizing.

Thus every idea which our experts developed was put to the mileage test. Thus rival tires were compared with our own.

Thus year after year Goodyear tires were made better. In the course of time we got close to finality.

Rim-Cutting Ended

Then we found a way to end rim-cutting—a method controlled by our patents.

We examined thousands of ruined old-type tires, and we found that 23 per cent. had been rim-cut. By ending this trouble—at vast expense—we saved that 23 per cent.

In seven years' experience with No-Rim-Cut tires there has never been an instance of rim-cutting.

Adding 25 Per Cent to the Mileage

Then we found that extras added to cars were overloading tires.

So we made these tires—No-Rim-Cut tires—10 per cent. over the rated size.

That meant 10 per cent. more air—10 per cent. added carrying capacity. And that, with the average car, adds 25 per cent. to the tire mileage.

With these tires of maximum quality—made oversize, made so they can't rim-cut—we met the prices of other standard tires.

Average Profit 8½%

Last year our average profit on No-Rim-Cut tires was 8½ per cent.

Every penny we got, save a profit of 8½ per cent., went into size and quality.

That in a factory with the largest output and most modern equipment ever known in this industry.

That in a risky business, with fluctuating materials, on a tire that's guaranteed.

You will never get more for your money—more mileage per dollar spent—than in Goodyear No-Rim-Cut tires. That must be apparent to you.

The proof of that fact has brought 200,000 motorists to the use of these premier tires.

Our 1912 Tire Book—based on 13 years of tire making—is filled with facts you should know. Ask us to mail it to you.

Dr. Clark Among the Ruins of Corinth

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF ST. PAUL

THE APOSTLE'S NEIGHBORS AND FRIENDS IN CORINTH

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Founder and President of the Christian Endeavor

FORTUNATELY, in visiting Corinth to-day, we can come a little nearer to the city as St. Paul saw it than if the squalid Greek village described in the last article, and which now ·cupies its site, were all that we could see. This ·ndeed was almost all that could be seen a few years ·go, when the American School of Archeology ·ndertook to lay bare some of Corinth's ancient ·lories. In 1896 their excavations were begun, ·nd have been richly rewarded.

It has been no easy task to dig down through ·ayer after layer of superimposed ruins to the real ·ity of St. Paul, and to uncover ·he pavements which he must ·ave trod. Perhaps the apostle ·id not figure very largely in the ·urposes of these archeologists, ·ut they have certainly put the ·hristian world under obligation ·o them by their laborious re·earches. Romans, Sicilians, ·enetians, Turks, in their suc·essive occupations, had done ·heir best to obliterate all traces ·f the old Corinth. They had ·arried off the marbles and the ·oble statues, and had built these ·recious stones, defaced and dis·onored, into the walls of their ·ortresses or their pigsties.

Nature, in the course of eigh·een hundred years, had com·leted the work of obliteration ·hich man had begun. Rocks ·nd débris, gravel and good soil ·ad washed down from the moun·ains, and only a few of the ·iant columns of the Temple of ·pollo resisted the attacks of ·nan and nature, and stood to ·nark the site of the once proud ·ity But the knowledge and skill ·f the excavators triumphed, ·nd they have at last dug down ·o the level of the streets trod by ·illions in the heyday of Cor·nth's prosperity.

Going through a wicket gate ·hich admits to the ruins, we ·ome first to a marble-paved ·treet which led from the market ·lace toward the western har·bor of Corinth on the Gulf. This was once flanked with colonnades, and behind these on one side are the ruins of sixteen shops. It is known for a certainty that this marble-paved street and these shops belonged to the first century of our era, and are, beyond a question, the street on which Paul walked and in all probability the shops where he traded.

We seem to be coming very close to the great apostle when we, too, tread these marble slabs. We are indeed following in his footsteps. If the water were still running, we might even drink at the spring where he must have quenched his thirst, for the great fountain of Corinth has also been discovered.

In this great fountain, which now looks like a series of caverns in the partially excavated bank, five building periods can be discovered—two Greek, two Roman, and one Byzantine. The different rulers embellished the fountain with marble panels, adorned it with beautiful statuary, and the six great chambers into which the water flowed from behind were always surrounded by throngs of Corinthians who had come for water, or for their daily gossip with their neighbors.

To the right, as we face the fountain, on a low hill is the most interesting ruin of Corinth—the great temple, probably dedicated to Apollo. Originally this temple had fifteen massive columns on each side and six at each end, but only seven of them are standing to-day. They are hewn out of a single rock. To record the fact that each column was over twenty-three feet high, nearly six feet in diameter at the base, and over four feet at the top, gives but a faint idea of this magnificent temple, which, in Corinth's days of splendor, was probably her most conspicuous building as it is now her most magnificent ruin.

It does not take a very vivid imagination to people Corinth with Paul's friends and enemies, his faithful disciples, and the apostates of the church as well, who caused him such grief and anguish.

We can imagine that one of the large vaulted shops that line the marble road he so often trod was the tent-making establishment of Aquila and Priscilla. They, like Paul, were Jews. They had been banished from Rome by one of the many persecutions which then, as now, befell this afflicted nation in Europe. They had settled in Corinth, and had begun to ply their trade again when Paul reached the city. Attracted by a common nationality and a common business, Paul sought them out and took up his abode with them, working for his daily bread in their shop side by side with the slaves whom, doubtless, they employed.

Whether they were Christians before Paul met them in Corinth, or whether they were among his first converts, we do not know; but we know that they were faithful and beloved to the end, for just before Paul's martyrdom at Rome we find them at Ephesus, and to them there "Paul the aged" sent his salutation (II. Tim. 4: 19) through his beloved disciple Timothy. They were evidently people of some means, for they are spoken of as holding Christian services in their house, both in Rome (Rom. 16: 5) after their return from Corinth, and in Ephesus (I. Cor. 16: 19) at a later period. "The church that is in their house" tells us much of their hospitality and prosperity as well. It is interesting to note that Priscilla is usually mentioned first by Paul, "Priscilla and Aquila," not Aquila and Priscilla. My readers may draw their own inferences from this of the relative standing of husband and wife in Paul's estimation.

I have just seen and handled in the little museum at Corinth, where the choicest relics from the ruins are stored, close by the wicket gate that leads to them, a broken marble slab on which is carved in Greek letters the word:

SYNAGOGUE

Doubtless this very slab was placed over the door of the modest building where Paul worshiped on his first Sabbath in Corinth. Here, we are told, he "reasoned every Sabbath, and persuaded Jews and Greeks" (Acts 18: 4). Soon Timothy and Silas came down from Macedonia, and then Paul, encouraged by their presence, seems to have become more bold and "was constrained by the Word, testifying to the Jews that Jesus was the Christ" (Acts 18: 5).

This little story gives us a very human touch, for it shows us the great preacher's dependence on human sympathy and the presence of dear friends. The coming of these two trusted brethren and lieutenants gave him new courage. He tells us in his first letter to the Corinthians that he was in Corinth "in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling" (I .Cor. 2: 3), and in the second letter how he had been "comforted by the coming of Titus" (II. Cor. 7: 6). So now he was comforted and emboldened by the arrival of Silas and Timothy, and spoke with unusual boldness and conviction of the theme nearest his heart, Christ the Messiah.

This boldness had its natural effect. It angered the strict Jews so that they opposed him violently and "blasphemed." Paul knew that he should receive from the Gentiles a more unprejudiced hearing, and he must make the most of his time and opportunities "if by any means he might save some."

The moment of his turning to the Gentiles of Corinth was a dramatic one. Imagine that little tentmaker, lately come to the great, luxurious, corrupt city, repudiated by his own countrymen, taking off his outer garments and shaking the very dust out of them, as he stood near the synagogue, as a testimony that just as his robe was free from the dust of the synagogue, so he was free from responsibility for the blood of those who would not listen to his glad tidings. But he would still preach this good news; if not in the synagogue, then in a house which "joined hard," that belonged to Titus Justus, one of his early Corinthian converts. We know nothing more of Justus. His name is never again mentioned, but he is forever immortalized as one who opened his own house, and his heart as well, to Paul and the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Yet though the apostle's preaching in the synagogue seemed foredoomed to failure, it was not altogether without effect, for Crispus (Acts 18: 8), one of the rulers of that very synagogue, believed on the Lord and left the Jews' church, with all his household, for the humble Christian meeting-house under Justus' roof. Stephanas, too, was a prominent member of this first church of Corinth. Indeed, he was the first charter member (I. Cor. 16: 15). How Paul must have rejoiced over his first Corinthian convert! Did not the similarity of name often remind him of the first Christian martyr, to whose death he was "consenting," and whose glorious heroism seems to have so ennobled his whole life? Gaius also was another of Paul's friends and early converts—Gaius the hospitable—whose home was Paul's on a later visit, and who stands to the world as the exemplification of Christian hospitality. "Gaius my host" (Rom. 16: 23); what a proud title to the remembrance of posterity to be Paul's host in Corinth!

A Greek Peasant of Modern Corinth

Then how many things they had to talk over in this house of Titus Justus! The great truths that their own prophets had uttered, now first fulfilled; the marvelous experience of Paul in the Damascus road; the later and more quiet experience of each convert; and, above all, the words and deeds of Him who "spake as never man spake." Happy indeed must have been the early meetings of this new Christian family! But the serpent wound his slimy way into Paradise; Judas took his seat among the Twelve; and very soon into the little band of Corinthian Christians came disturbers of its peace and purity. Some there were who were openly impure and even incestuous, justifying themselves on the ground that they were no longer under the law but under grace.

A still larger party were quarrelsome and contentious. Some rejected the authority of Paul, and claimed to be followers of Apollos. Others, apparently, claimed to be just Christians, implying that Paul did not preach the doctrines of Christ. Even in our own day we hear of those who reject Paul's teaching under the specious plea: "Back to Christ." We know Paul's answer to these malcontents, and need not rehearse it here.

How wonderfully are we in these later days indebted even to these disputatious critics! Many of the finest passages in the greatest epistles are called forth by their opposition. Would the thirteenth chapter of I. Corinthians ever have been written with its splendid panegyric on Love, which "suffereth long and is kind," and which is greater even than Faith and Hope, if Paul had not been wounded to the quick by these quarrelsome brethren?

Would the magnificent chapter (I. Cor. 15) on Immortality and the Life to Come have been written had not some in Corinth obstinately denied the resurrection? Who can tell?

Would the discriminating verses about the "weak bróther" "for whom Christ died" and the "meat offered to idols" ever have been dictated had not Paul lived for two years in this great heathen city, and seen every day the mighty Temple to Apollo on the hillside where, year by year, hecatombs of beasts were offered to idols?

One more incident in the life of Paul at Corinth must be recorded, an incident which partakes both of tragedy and comedy. The Jewish enemies of Paul, who were always on his track, dogging his footsteps and hindering his work, at length accused him before the new governor, Gallio, who had just been appointed proconsul for Greece, of subverting their law. Now, Gallio, as we know from secular history, was a just as well as a good-natured man. He was a brother of Seneca, the great Roman philosopher, who writes of him with real affection. This was probably the first case of the kind that had come before him since his appointment to his important post. We can easily imagine him sitting in the great imperial chair, symbol of Roman authority, in some open space in Corinth, perhaps near the famous fountain I have described. Paul is brought before him. His accusers are wild in their denunciations. Sosthenes, the new ruler of the synagogue, is the chief speaker. The Greeks are standing around, eagerly listening, with little love for the Christians but less for the Jews.

Paul is about to reply, when Gallio, disgusted with the foolish triviality of the accusations, dismisses the whole case with the contemptuous remark: "I am not minded to be a judge of these matters," and drove the Jews from the judgment-seat. Then the mob, emboldened by the governor's attitude, seized the occasion they had often longed for, and laying hold of Sosthenes beat him before the very judgment-seat, unrebuked by Gallio, who "cared for none of these things." Thus the would-be beater was beaten; Haman was hanged upon his own gallows, and Paul and his party, for a time at least, were saved from further persecution.

Here we may well leave him, so far as his residence in Corinth is concerned, with the comforting words of the Lord ringing in his ears: "I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to harm thee: for I have much people in this city." Yes, even in Corinth, corrupt, dissolute, worldly Corinth, God had a people, and no man, O Paul, shall do thee harm until thy great mission has been fulfilled and thou hast preached the glorious good tidings not only to the Corinthians but in many another city throughout the Roman world.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—THE CANADIAN LINER Zeiten opened the season of navigation on the St. Lawrence River between Quebec and European ports on April 28, when she docked with 1,100 immigrants and 4,000 tons of cargo. Up to that date there was an ice jam eighteen miles in length between Cap Rouge and Point aux Trembles blocking the route to Montreal.

—A GIANT ICEBERG, similar to that which sank the Titanic, threatened disaster to the Canadian Pacific liner Empress of Britain with 1,460 passengers aboard, which arrived in Halifax on April 26 from Liverpool. Passengers say that on Wednesday at 10 o'clock in the morning the vessel, while in latitude 46 north, longtitude 47 west, was swerved just in time to avoid a serious collision. Fortunately the ship was steaming slowly at the time because of a dense fog. There were many passengers on deck and, all being familiar with the Titanic's fate, many were panicky until assured that there was no danger.

—A DESPATCH FROM Crescent Beach, Conn., states that George Borup, of New York, who was with Peary almost to the end of his successful dash to the North Pole, and Samuel Winship Case, of Norwich, Conn., both graduate students of Yale University, were drowned in Long Island Sound on April 28, when their power canoe was suddenly overturned by a heavy sea. The young men had gone to spend the day in a summer cottage belonging to Mr. Case's family. Early in the morning they started out in their canoe, headed for New London. They were not seen until about five o'clock, when Harry Gardner, a quarry owner at Millstone, saw the canoe suddenly capsize. He immediately put out in a fast power boat. He at first saw one man clinging to the overturned craft, but before he could reach the scene, which was a half hour's run from shore, the body had disappeared. George Borup, the son of Lieutenant Colonel Borup, U.S.A., retired, was twenty-three years old when he joined the Peary Polar Exposition in 1908 as a member of the scientific staff. Among his duties were those of photographer of the expedition. He had been an athlete at Yale, which enabled him to undergo the hardships in the arctic. Borup was graduated in 1907 with the degree of B.A., and was pursuing advanced courses in geology at the graduate school.

—THE SHOCKING SCENE of slaughter known as the "Battle of London," which occurred in January, 1911, when a few desperadoes taking shelter in a house in Whitechapel defied hundreds of police and soldiers headed by government officials, until their retreat was fired, had its terrible counterpart near Paris on Sunday, April 28. A fierce desperado, Bonnot, and several of his notorious band were brought to bay in a garage at Choisy-le-Roi, six miles south of the city. They put up a desperate resistance, battling for hours against tremendous odds. They were trapped in the building, which was surrounded by police gendarmes and republican guards. With rifles and revolvers the police and soldiers poured volley after volley into the garage, their shots being returned by a steady rain of lead from the attacked. Bonnot was shooting from the first floor and two detectives went down under his deadly fusillade. Finally, the authorities determined to blow up the building and for this purpose they procured carts on which they placed mattresses for shields and in this manner got close to the walls, where they placed sticks of dynamite. Those detailed to light the fuse got back to safety before the terrific explosion. Bonnot, the leader, was found riddled with a dozen bullets, but still alive; he died on the way to the hospital. His chief lieutenant, Dubois, was already dead. The wiping out of Bonnot's gang clears Paris of the worst band of desperadoes ever known to the police. They went around in automobiles, first killing and then robbing their victims. Their daring reached a climax in the murder of Assistant Superintendent Jouin of the Detective Department and the wounding of Chief Inspector Colmar on April 24.

CLOSE OF THE MEN'S CAMPAIGN

THE MEN AND RELIGION FORWARD MOVEMENT REVIEWED

Fred. B. Smith
The Campaign Leader

The Platform of Carnegie Hall, New York, on the Evening of the Last Meeting

Roy B. Guild
Executive Secretary

I COULD not keep my eyes from the archdeacon's face. He sat there, or stood, the embodiment of everything traditional and conservative. A thousand years of British history and social habit were in his face; more than a thousand years of churchly custom were implied in his garb and in something of his manner. His black waistcoat was the ecclesiastical apron, reaching to his knees. His buttoned gaiters reached to knees again, from ankles. Yet he was as unconscious of his garb as a laborer in his daily clothes. And the gaiters were so loose and comfortable, and the apron so shadowed in the folds of his frock coat that there seemed after all very little about his costume that was unusual—even for the United States.

But his face—sheer benevolence! What a good time he was having! When three thousand other men sat down to pray, he stood up. When the conductor vigorously beat the time for the great songs, while the gold cornet behind him swelled out the strains, the archdeacon all unconsciously beat time with his hymn-book in a perfectly involuntary, absent-minded manner, as he might if leading a class of a dozen little boy and girl catechumens. He beamed upon everybody, not patronizingly. He was simply having a good time. He was seated in a row of men of world-wide prominence, among them Bishop Hendrix, Gipsy Smith, Dr. Jowett, Editor Macdonald of the Toronto Globe, Dr. David Russell of South Africa, and Fred B. Smith. As new arrivals passed near his chair, at the side or in front of him, the archdeacon nodded companionably. Not many happened to notice the nod or return it. In fact, you could see it was not meant to be returned. It wasn't given to the man as a favor. The archdeacon was simply saying with his head what his heart kept saying: "Ah, here's another dear fellow who loves God. I'm glad he has come."

Much of the time his chin was tilted upward. You could see that something kept coming down from somewhere above, into the archdeacon's soul. At those times there were flashes of a strange light upon his face. When Gipsy Smith had made us all stand, and was playing on the voices of that big assembly as an organist plays his instrument, particularly when he asked the chorus behind him to hum an accompaniment while he sang the verse, the archdeacon's eyes filled up with tears, again and again. No wonder, for these were the words, and the Gipsy never sang with more magic sweetness:

> "I'll go with him through the garden,
> I'll go with him through the garden,
> I'll go with him through the garden,
> I'll go with him, with him all the way."

You can imagine there was some such look as this of the archdeacon's on John Wesley's face when his heart became strangely moved, or on Luther's face, when he heard a voice reminding him that "the just shall live by faith." And you knew it was not the first time the face of this new saint had borne that look.

Of course he was Archdeacon Madden, and of course you know that the occasion was the closing service of the Conservation Congress at Carnegie Hall, New York, where nearly fifteen hundred delegates had been meeting for six days, from April 19 to 24, to bring to a focus the work of the Men and Religion Forward Movement. It was a notable assembly, closing a notable campaign. And any one who might have been skeptical about the spiritual soundness and strength of the movement need only to have attended that service to be convinced that the Holy Spirit has been in the great crusade. Many another heart besides that of the good archdeacon was blessed by the addresses and the songs, and one knew that this must have been the atmosphere and the spirit of the gatherings of the wide campaign.

The hymns selected and sung seemed another answer to the criticism which has been frequently heard during the progress of the movement, on the ground that it has lacked something of vital, enthusiastic spirituality. This was the first hymn, sung earnestly by these regiments of Christian soldiers:

> Show me thy face—one transient gleam
> Of loveliness divine,
> And I shall never think or dream
> Of other love save thine.

A Group of the Experts Who Conducted the Campaign

Then this:

> We would see Jesus—for the shadows lengthen
> Across the little landscape of our life.
> We would see Jesus, our weak faith to strengthen
> For the last weariness—the final strife.

After this the great strains of Diadem rolled forth, and how the basses gloried in the majestic run toward the close! How heartily Jowett and Macdonald sang while the archdeacon beamed, "Crown—— Him Lord of All!"

The fervent prayer by Dr. Russell, who has been called the "Moody of South Africa," the addresses by the team leaders and other officials, the few rapt moments under Gipsy Smith's leadership, the capital address by Dr. Nehemiah Boynton, bearing the greetings of the Congregational communion to the men of the Congress, the singing of the International Association Quartet, led up to the closing address of the Congress, which brought to an end the nation-wide campaign begun nearly two years ago. It was delivered by Dr. J. H. Jowett on the "Coming of the Kingdom," and was a plea for spiritual optimism. "I wish we might have a new society," he said; "a society of people who would be watching for signs of the morning, and reporting them; vigilant scouts, looking for sunbeams, people who would invade the world for signs of sunrise. We should pray the prayer, 'Thy kingdom come,' as seers, believing that the kingdom is coming, and seeing already in our vision the kingdom as it will be; as soldiers, or crusaders, fighting for the kingdom; as watchmen, looking for and announcing the signs of its coming." A song by the quartet, "Still, Still with Thee," and the benediction closed the Congress.

Now that the campaign is over, now that the more than thirteen hundred delegates have gone back from the Congress to their cities and their churches, the question of most vital interest is: "What next?" "What is going to come of it all?"

A number of things will probably come of it; but one thing will not come of it, and that is a new organization. Terrific pressure has been brought to bear upon the leaders of the movement to make it permanent, but they have persistently and emphatically declined. One rich man was so enthusiastic that he offered $100,000 to help support a permanent organization, but his offer was refused.

This in itself is a spectacle worthy of the notice and commendation of Christians. The team leaders, speaking at the last meeting of the work of their men, testified that these men had worked in a spirit of the utmost unselfishness and self-sacrifice. This is easy to believe since the whole organization passes voluntarily now out of existence. Its leaders promised at the beginning that they would do this; and they have done it.

But the various organizations which have been co-operating with them are already under way at the work of continuation. The men's brotherhood of one denomination has already officially decided to carry on the work among the men reached by its own communion, putting on foot a campaign which will convey the message and follow the program of the Men and Religion Movement. It is expected that five other denominations will do the same. As a further fruitage of the campaign, the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. has established a new Bible Study Department and selected M. A. Honline of Dayton, O., to manage it. The International Sunday School Association has decided to take on a new, enlarged and specialized work for boys under the direction of John W. Alexander of New York. The committee of Ninety-seven, which has managed the movement, recommended in its final report that steps be taken to keep the various brotherhoods and other organizations in touch with one another's work, and that an annual summer conference be arranged where workers in these organizations may meet for fellowship, study and planning.

A SERMON

By

Rev. J. H. Jowett, D.D.*

DEADLY DELAY

TEXT: "Let the dead bury their dead: but go thou and preach the kingdom of God." Luke 9: 60

DOES that sound harsh and ungracious? Does it seem to disparage filial piety, to trample upon those delicate courtesies which soften and beautify domestic life? Do we resent the tone of the Speaker? But have we got the Speaker's tone? For tone is a vital factor in the significance of speech. A change of tone changes the meanings of words. Alter a tone and a threat becomes an appeal, coercion becomes constraint. A passage like this is easily misunderstood and abused. We can so interpret the words as to make our Lord impoverish human life rather than enrich it. We can make him desanctify the sacred and put parental and filial sanctities among cheap and needless conventions. And such interpretation would crucify the Son of Man afresh and put him to open shame.

A Typical Auditor

We must begin all our interpretations of the words of Jesus with the guidance of certain fundamental assumptions, and from these we must never depart. First, we must assume that the Lord Jesus Christ is the very fountain of all true, deep, tender human love. Second, we must assume that the Lord Jesus Christ is the essential bond in all human ties and kinships. In him we discover the mystic cement which constitutes the solidarity of the race. "In him all things consist." Third, we must assume that the Lord Jesus Christ, when he moved along the ways of men, was the perfect ideal of courtesy and grace. And so with these assumptions in our minds as the axioms of interpretation let us meditate on the incident of our text.

I feel sure that our Lord was very intimate with this man. He was just the kind of man who would be found in every audience the Master addressed. He was in the company on the hill, or in the village street, or by the seashore, or in the house; wherever our Lord was speaking there this man was to be found, a keenly interested member of the crowd. Jesus knew his face, he divined his character, for "he knew what was in man." I think I can partially recover his face and character from the veiling mist of the years. He was a man of moods and impulses. He was easily moved and sometimes profoundly moved. His emotions were far more lively than his faith, and far more vigorous than his will. We should have described him as "good-hearted," with the half disparaging suggestion we imply when we wish to convey the impression that the other sides of a man's character are soft and faulty.

A Man of Impulses and Emotions

One day he was at the Jordan hearing John the Baptist. John swept him like the wind swept their own familiar lake. His emotions were lashed into tumult, and they submerged his entire being. "That was the prophet for him!" "He would enlist in the fellowship of John's disciples! His disciples were evidently the pioneers of the kingdom and he would enroll in the holy crusade. Yes! he would become one of John's disciples, but not that day! He would wait until the morrow! It was more than probable that on the morrow his friends would accompany him and they would be baptized together!" And the much-moved man returned home, but long before he reached home the emotional storm had subsided and self-complacency was found where noble impulse had so lately reigned. On the morrow no sign of the storm remained.

I cannot say how often he had been moved by our Lord. Now he had been melted by a tender word, again he was spurred by an awful warning, and again he was quickened by some wooing call. He was moved I know not how often, but he was never moved to immediate decision and the choice of destiny. He was moved but remained stationary. He was moved but he was never on the march. He felt the gale of the Spirit but he never hoisted his sail. He often felt the influence of a favorable wind but he never got out of the harbor. He was always about to do something but the something was never done.

But one day it seemed as though emotion was to manifest itself in motion, as though feeling was about to register itself in action, as though the die were about to be cast and fickleness to precipitate itself in noble decision. I know not what it was, whether the Master's doings or the Master's teachings or the Master's pleadings, but the man's hour was come. "And Jesus said unto him, Follow me!" And he answered with a ready and jubilant response, "Lord, I will follow thee, but suffer me first . . . !" There he is again, back in excuse, retreating in makeshift and evasion! I do not for one moment think that the father was dead. I think he was an aged man and that the son's meaning might be found in our familiar words, "I must wait until the old man is at rest!" And the Master answered him in a word which meant, "Let the dead talk in that deadly way; thy excuses are always fatal evasions. Go thou and preach the kingdom of God!"

Perils of Procrastination

What is there in all this of modern application? First of all we are taught the exceeding delicacy of spiritual impulse. When we are dealing with spiritualities we are dealing with matters of superlative delicacy, and their power and bloom can be easily bruised and destroyed. We know that even a physical aptitude can be impaired or deranged. It is quite easy to lose some power of skilful motion, some grace or speed of hand, some delicacy and refinement of touch. The principle is even more manifest in higher planes of feeling. An esthetic discernment can be neglected and forfeited. Darwin lost his musical taste. A sense of the music of words may pass from a man, and his well-ordered language can degenerate into a disorder resembling an army in rout. But when we ascend to more inherently spiritual things the delicacy is inexpressible. We can easily lose the sense of spiritual hearing, the perception of the "still small voice." We can easily lose our gift of spiritual love. We can just as easily lose our wealth of spiritual regret, the moods of penitence, shame, sorrow and remorse.

And, therefore, in the second place we are taught the exceeding peril of procrastination. If spiritual things are abandoned they die. If they are neglected they are famished. If they are deferred they begin to wither away. I appeal to practical experience in confirmation of the Master's teaching. Some event happens in our life, a sobering circumstance which exercises an unusual influence upon us. Perhaps it is a funeral, or perhaps it is some calamity. Some sober-suited set of circumstances has opened depths in the garish day, and we have a vision. The vision is creative of some holy impulse which bids us say, "I will follow." And almost before the funeral is over, while we are in the carriage that brings us from the grave, the delicate thing has gone.

Opportunities Neglected

Or we have heard some mystic call. Perhaps our birthday has startled us by its figure. We have seen the thing in writing and it has made us very serious. We find we are "getting on." "Is it not time for a nobler, deeper, more purposeful life?" "Yes! it is; I will follow, but . . .!" And the delicate thing is slain.

Or we have heard some sermon, or read some book. We have been pulled up in our carelessness. Our soul stands at attention like a soldier hearing his name at the roll-call. "Yes! I follow, but . . .!" And it is all over. These tender things are slain by procrastination. We are always about to do and the gracious thing is never done. We are always "going presently," and every present hour steals away into a gloom from which there is no recovery, into the prison-house of neglected opportunities, into the weird waste-heap of withered purpose and dead ideal. We are all familiar with these disasters. Our procrastination has murdered gracious things by the hundred. How many beautiful things with wings are lying dead in the road of our past life, godly impulses, godly visions, godly intentions and vows! And the years are flying, flying fast. And still our relationship to the eternal God our Father must be told in these cold and awful words, "Strangers yet, strangers yet."

"Seek Ye First the Kingdom"

And the third lesson we are taught by our Master is the supreme importance of observing the relative values of things. Nothing is so precious as a divine impulse, and nothing must be allowed to elbow it into a second place. In secular affairs our king's command is supreme. Everything else has to go. Whether the cabinet minister is at home or abroad, at work or at play, when his sovereign summons him he must instantly obey. The secret of a great life is to be found in a similar apportionment of values, and in an instant response to the call of our God. "Seek ye first the kingdom"; which really means, "Seek ye first the King!" "Seek him!" Let nothing come before him! The Lord's will is a divine command for absolute surrender to the Highest. "Follow me." "Now" and "wholly"; these are the two emphases of the consecrated life as these are the two essentials of all true devotion.

which will contain the reports of the commissions on Publicity, Boys' Work, Evangelization, the Rural Church, Social Service, Missions, Bible Study, and Christian Unity, together with the addresses delivered during the Congress. This will form an intensely valuable library for the men of the churches, giving them specific and practical information as to how they may best do the actual work to which this great crusade has called them.

Seven thousand five hundred and eighty men and boys made a definite decision to accept Christ during the campaign. This report alone justifies all that the movement has cost of time, energy and money. Altogether 7,062 meetings were held, at which 8,332 addresses were given to a total attendance of 1,492,645 persons. Over twenty-six thousand men and boys committed themselves for personal service.

While all the sessions of the closing Congress were important, some of them were of thrilling interest, as when Jane Addams talked with rare womanly sweetness and tact, yet with fearless frankness, about the church and the social evil; when Bryan addressed the assembly, and when he spoke in the open air; when Gipsy Smith addressed a mass meeting in the Hippodrome, at which from one to two hundred men decided to follow Christ; and when a sad memorial service was held for William T. Stead on the night of Monday, April 22, when he was to have addressed the Congress on "Universal Peace."

The churches have found out afresh that they can work together. The world has had another demonstration that Christianity is a matter that appeals to men and makes them strive manfully for the kingdom of the Christ they honor. The men of the churches have had a new vision of the work waiting to be done, work for the boys, work for their communities, work for their neighbors and friends that will bring them to Christ. The archdeacon's face sums it all up. Men have been working together eagerly to get other men to go to work vigorously and wisely to bring still others to Christ; and in working thus all have come to love one another, to forget their differences, and to receive heaven's blessing upon their own churches and their own souls.

HIS PROMISE

WHEN assailed by storm and danger,
When the day is dark and drear,
Show the rainbow of thy promise;
Help us all thy voice to hear.

Father, when we falter, guide us,
Voyagers on life's wide sea;
Let no cloud from thee divide us,
Keep us ever near to thee.

For each sin we ask forgiveness—
Small and weak, at best, we are—
But, with thee, when night is darkest,
We shall find a guiding star.

Help us to forgive a brother
As thou dost forgive us all,
Lift the burdens of another
For thy blessing then to call.

Bless us now, our Father, bless us—
Thine the glory, thine the praise!
For the goodness thou hast shown us
Songs of joy and hope we raise.

Dr. Jowett on the "Titanic" Disaster

From his sermon on April 21

IT IS in crises like these that the soul craves for some certain foothold, some firm assurance, "holy ground," some steadfast hope which remains unshaken in a tempest. It is the good pleasure of God to retain the ministry of the cloud. We see all things "as in a mirror darkly." There must be a strong and gracious ministry in mystery, or its presence and discipline would not be so continuously used. Even when our understandings are clearest the limiting mist remains, but "the clouds drop fatness."

We have passed through a terrible week, but it appears to me that the world is essentially richer than it was before the great liner was lost. We are richer in common sense. We are richer in discernment and discrimination of values, and in the firm determination to put first things first. We are richer in that pure indignation which is the minister and guardian of true progress. And we are richer in the bonds of human kinship. The entire race is making a simultaneous passage through a common sorrow, and the welding power of the experience cannot possibly be expressed. Humanity is one in the "love and pity" that redeems.

We are surely richer from the amazing exhibition of sublimest courage. Our men went down, but they retained their manliness even in the hour of apparent defeat. They lost their lives, but they did not lose themselves. In a certain glorious sense they were grander and mightier than the seas that overwhelmed them. In their self-control, in their self-forgetfulness, in their quiet chivalry and self-renunciation, in their calm acceptance of death rather than the selfish grasp and possession of life—in all these things they revealed a majesty before which every other form of power is eclipsed; and when the horrors of that awful night have become dim, their triumph will remain an abiding enrichment of the noblest glories of our race. And this is their holy fame: they chose the lonely night rather than the inglorious day.

The Hollow of His Hand

By Eugene Thwing

LITTLE Edward went back to his play in the haymow after his early supper, but he never intended to go sound asleep there, and he was confused and almost afraid when he awoke in the dark and heard his father's voice calling him. It was not exactly dark in the spot where he lay, because a band of white moonlight fell across the hayloft. Everywhere else was pitchy dark—it seemed unusually dark by contrast with this band of light just as wide as the window.

"Where are you, papa?" answered the little fellow, hardly yet awake, as his father called again.

"Right here, below you; never mind the ladder; just jump, and I'll catch you."

"But it's dark down there; I can't see you, papa," answered the boy.

"Never mind; I can see you. It's only a short way. You will jump right into my hands. Don't be afraid." So Edward took the leap, trustfully, into the darkness, and the next instant found himself safe in his father's hands.

IN THE cabin of a ship, a group of men and women huddled close around one of their number who was praying. Elsewhere confusion held sway. In this little group there was peace as the man prayed: "Dear God, we want just now to shut our ears to the noise about us and listen to thy voice. We want to shut out all the terror from our hearts and take in thy peace. The waters of the sea look vast, and black, and angry to us this night, but we know that thou hast measured the waters in the hollow of thy hand. We were thinking, just now, that we were helpless on the great deep, but we were foolish to be so frightened, because there is no place we would rather be than in the hollow of thy loving hand.

"We like to live and do our work, and we have done our utmost to save ourselves, but our utmost is very little and we seem to have measured already its short span. It is good to know that thy hand is not shortened that it cannot save, and that even now we are in the hollow of thy hand.

"The life we have been trying to save is a little life at best, while the life for which thou canst save us is a more abundant life. The work we would like to continue is small and narrow at its best, while thou canst give us 'greater things than these' to do; so we are ready to accept thy choice for us now, whatever it may be.

"We cannot see thee in the dark just now, dear Father, but we know that thou canst see us, and we can hear thy dear voice in our hearts calling to us, 'It is I, be not afraid.' We will go down in the dark if thou dost call us, knowing that it is only a short way, and knowing that 'the eternal God is our refuge and underneath are the everlasting arms.'" So the man prayed on, while those who could were working, and others were waiting.

ALONE in his private office, with the door locked, a man struggled with adverse fate. Never had he felt so much alone, so deserted, so helpless. He went over in detail the various measures he had taken to conquer his difficulties, and tried to think what more he could do. It seemed that he had exhausted every hope, and that nothing remained possible except the intervention of Providence in his behalf. "Make haste, Lord, to help me," he cried. "Carest thou not that I perish? Wilt thou leave me alone in my extremity? Are these affairs that seem to me so vital too insignificant in thy sight to claim thy interest and succor?"

Then a flush of shame swept over the man as he remembered how many and how real had been the evidences in the past of the Father's interest and help in his affairs, and he began to feel anew the immanence of God even in the time of stress and storm. Trustfulness and new strength came to him as he said to his soul, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise him for the help of his countenance."

His fear and rebellion seemed wrong and foolish as he remembered that he was now as much as ever in his Father's hands, even though all about him seemed dark. Just now he could not see his Father's hand, but his Father could see him and knew how to hold him safe and guide him into the best way.

ON a bed of pain and weakness a mother lay thinking of all the experiences that had swept over her in a few short months. A talented husband had been taken from her after a lingering illness. Her own professional career had met with unexpected disaster. After repeated disappointments a new career of brilliant promise opened for her, only to be cut short at its very beginning by the sudden illness and death of her eldest son, just making his mark in business. Then she herself was laid low with serious illness. Troubles innumerable had heaped themselves greedily upon her, but she remembered, through them all, that the Father was not afar off, and that she was safe in the hollow of his hand. Rising once more from the sick-bed, she wrote, "I believe so surely that nothing ever happens out of time or place, that I realize these months of inactivity and of mental and physical stress for me have been rightly conceived and were needed for my right unfoldment. They have brought to me a greater comprehension, a wider vision, more spiritual development than all previous years of my life. One must needs, sometimes, go down into the very fires of hell in the matter of suffering in order to get rid of the dross and preserve the pure gold of the spirit. So I count the past months as the richest in my existence, though never before have I been so utterly bereft of the material things of life."

What is there to dread in the deep sea, even though its waves dash in tumult, or the dark clouds cover the face of the waters? What is there to dread in the storm or the stress of life, even when the dearest plans seem to be wrecked and experiences we call "disaster" overwhelm us? What is there to dread in the night of pain or sorrow, even when the flesh is weak and the heart is torn? All these waters have been measured "in the hollow of his hand." They cannot be too great; they cannot overflow; we are still in his hand. Whether the storm rage over a dark sea or within a troubled soul, he is able to say, "Peace, be still," and the obedient waves and the obedient heart shall instantly obey his will.

Poems Everyone Should Know

FRIENDS DEPARTED

THEY are all gone into the world of light,
And I alone sit lingering here;
Their very memory is fair and bright,
And my sad thoughts doth clear.

It glows and glitters in my cloudy breast,
Like stars upon some gloomy grove,
Or those faint beams in which this hill is drest
After the sun's remove.

I see them walking in an air of glory,
Whose light doth trample on my days:
My days, which are at best but dull and hoary,
Mere glimmering and decays.

O holy Hope! and high Humility,
High as the heavens above!
These are your walks, and you have show'd them me,
To kindle my cold love.

Dear, beauteous Death! the jewel of the Just,
Shining nowhere, but in the dark;
What mysteries do lie beyond thy dust,
Could man outlook that mark!

He that hath found some fledg'd bird's nest, may know
At first sight, if the bird be flown;
But what fair well or grove he sings in now,
That is to him unknown.

And yet as angels in some brighter dreams
Call to the soul, when man doth sleep:
So some strange thoughts transcend our wonted themes,
And into glory peep.

If a star were confined into a tomb,
Her captive flames must needs burn there;
But when the hand that lock'd her up, gives room,
She'll shine through all the sphere.

O Father of eternal life, and all
Created glorious under thee!
Resume thy spirit from this world of thrall
Into true liberty.

Either disperse these mists, which blot and fill
My perspective—still—as they pass:
Or else remove me hence unto that hill,
Where I shall need no glass.

HENRY VAUGHAN (1621-1695).

Henry Vaughan, known as the Silurist, was born in 1621 at Scethrog in Breconshire, Wales, and died in 1695. Little is known of his life, as he lived simply and did not mix in the stirring events of his time. He graduated at Oxford and lived for a short period in London, but soon returned to his native place in Wales, where he entered upon the practice of his profession as a physician, which he continued till his death.

His spiritual life, however, is an open book to those who wish to know. His poems, which have something of George Herbert's quaintness of style, are rich in spiritual experience and filled with the consciousness of the omnipresence of God in nature.

He was a child when James I died; he lived through the period of Charles I's reign and the Civil War and saw the passing of the King and the domination of Cromwell; the restoration of Charles II and his ensuing misgovernment, the crowning of James II and his subsequent deposition. He died when William and Mary had reigned six years.

Almanac in Daily Use

I thank you heartily for your very valuable and most replete Christian Herald Almanac. It is a treasure, a joy and a daily feast for one who partakes of its contents. The Lord bless and prosper the glorious work you are doing along all lines in his name. I feel as if I could not keep house without the weekly visit of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I anxiously await its coming. May perfect love and unbounded peace ever attend it. MRS. L. O. MILLER.

The Women of the Bible

The beautiful book, The Women of the Bible, came and it is indeed just beyond pen and ink to fully describe. Thanks! The paintings in the book are marvels of beauty, and the print is grand beyond comparison. I shall enjoy its reading. It is wonderful how you send such worthy gifts each year.

THE REINDEER QUEEN OF ALASKA

BY E. Y. WEAD, Now Chief of the Alaska Division of the Bureau of Education

Reindeer Mary, Two of Her Adopted Children, Her Husband and a Friend

An Alaskan-Bred Collie Guarding Part of Reindeer Mary's Herd

WHEN a woman in an enlightened country makes her way to a front rank in the industrial world, the fact soon becomes known and people are eager to learn something of the conditions that brought it about and of the character of the one who accomplished it. That a woman with a brown skin should also successfully compete with the men of her race is less generally understood. Out of the 260 Eskimos who own reindeer in Alaska, two are women. One of these, Mary Arisarlook Andrewnk, has received the title of "Reindeer Queen of Alaska."

It was nearly twenty years ago when the attention of the government was first called to the shocking condition of the native Alaskans. As savages they had lived on game and fish. Light, fuel, food and boats they had had from the whale; meat and clothing from wild animals. But the white man had driven the whales to other waters; seals and otter were becoming rare; the salmon streams had been taken from them; one trapper snared more game in a winter than sixty natives; the country was cold, the people knew no other resources.

A few great hearts had found a way to supply these sufferers with a subsistence, and through their efforts the United States Government began to stock the country with reindeer. The practice was continued till the Siberian Government placed an embargo on further shipments. By this time agents had distributed about the Barren Grounds of Alaska nearly five thousand deer and had opened up to the natives a traffic which already assures them an income of more than $25,000 a year.

It was through her first husband that "Reindeer Mary" came into possession of her herd. Charley Arisarlook was an accomplished herder and one of the first to avail himself of the opportunity to learn the business and be rewarded with a small herd. He was one of the natives who lent reindeer to the government and accompanied the overland relief expedition of 1898, which traveled a thousand miles through the storms and darkness of an Arctic winter, driving before them five hundred reindeer to feed the ice-imprisoned whalers off the coast of Point Barrow. Charley possessed the faithfulness and courage of a hero, but a few years later, when the country was swept by an epidemic of measles, he was one of the victims.

Mary, the widow, was inconsolable, and sought solace in drink. But the missionaries took her in hand; the herds she had inherited required attention. A young sister of her husband had been left homeless. Mary roused herself to meet duty half way. She became a Greek Catholic, though she now attends a Protestant church at Unalakleet, and she never parts with a friend going to "the States" without calling him in to offer a prayer for his safety.

"Queen Mary" owns a herd of 1,303 deer, which she manages with judgment and intelligence. According to the usual contract made with the government she is required to train three apprentices and to give to each the customary number of deer. She has done better than this. She has trained and rewarded eight or ten apprentices, and at the present time has another under her care. She long since discarded the igloo, or native hut, half underground, in which she was born, and is now comfortably housed near Nome, in a cabin of logs. She speaks seven or eight different languages—most of them merely Indian dialects—and this has enabled her to be of considerable service as an interpreter.

Queen Mary has brought up a number of helpless children, and having none of her own, has not only cared for them physically, but has also given them a place in her heart. Surely, according to her light, "she hath done her part."

THE DOLLY MADISON HARMONY BREAKFAST

DOLLY MADISON still lives in the hearts of the women of the United States, and she is generally acknowledged as the most charming and interesting mistress the White House has ever had. The time in which she was there helped her fame, because it was during the War of 1812, when the city of Washington was invaded by the British army, and not only the Capitol but the White House was burned by them. At that time Dolly Madison and others of her household took refuge in a house not far distant, carrying with her in her flight the portrait of George Washington, which she had torn from its frame with her hairpin. That house is now known as "The Octagon," and is fittingly occupied by the Archeological Institute of America.

The 20th of May will be the one hundred and fifth anniversary of the birth of Dolly Madison, and the women who cherish her memory propose giving a birthday breakfast in her honor. They call it a "Harmony Breakfast," because "she was the most potent feminine factor working for party good feeling in the past history of our republic."

The Dolly Madison Harmony Breakfast has been planned by eighty ladies, wives of senators and congressmen now in Washington. The tables will be prettily decorated with the spring wild flowers of Virginia, as that was Dolly Madison's native State.

No wines will be served; nothing stronger than coffee. Gifted speakers will enhance the occasion in their responses to toasts. The toastmistress will be Mrs. Champ Clark, who is a witty speaker.

"Of course Dolly Madison is our guest of honor," remarked one of the managers, "but as we want to have a guest of honor in the chair we have invited Mrs. Grover Cleveland as a mistress of the White House only second in popularity to Dolly Madison."

There will be some unique arrangements in the seating of the guests: one table has been reserved for the daughters and granddaughters of Democratic Presidents. Prominent among these will be two lovely young girls, Esther and Marion Cleveland, the first-named having been born in the White House. Another table has been reserved for the descendants of Presidents Jefferson, Monroe, Van Buren and Tyler.

The purpose of having the breakfast is to cultivate in women the spirit that was in Dolly Madison: patriotism, tolerance and broad-mindedness. The Dolly Madison Harmony Breakfast is likely to become an annual function, and to bring about a renaissance of unadulterated patriotism of the Dolly Madison type. It was suggested by Mrs. Robert C. Wickliffe. Mrs. Claude A. Swanson is the executive head of the Breakfast management. Mrs. Wm. A. Cullop is the treasurer. Mrs. Isaac R. Sherwood is the poet laureate of the occasion. MRS. W. F. C.

THE "TITANIC" INQUEST ENDED

ALTHOUGH the closing days of the Senatorial investigation of the Titanic disaster produced more verification of past testimony than anything else, a few important new details were brought out. The greatest interest during the last days centered around the subjects of wireless telegraphy and the so-called "phantom ship" which was seen by the Titanic survivors only a few miles away. Much of the evidence was given by the officers of the White Star Line and practically discounted some of the terrible accusations of lack of discipline, cowardice and inattention to duty which have been made. Charles W. Lightoller, who was again put upon the stand, volunteered the information that he was, in his own opinion, responsible for the telegrams which Mr. Ismay sent to the White Star Line officers in New York urging that the Cedric be held. He declared that while on the Carpathia Mr. Ismay suffered from extreme depression; that he was possessed by the conviction that he should have gone down with the ship. It was with the greatest difficulty that Mr. Ismay was aroused from his lethargy to take even sufficient interest to authorize the telegrams announcing the disaster and asking that the ship be held to take back the crew to England.

Robert Hichens, the quartermaster who was at the Titanic's wheel when the collision took place, told his story of the disaster and verified to a great extent all the statements which had been previously made, except those of Major Peuchen, who had accused him of personal misconduct and of using rough measures when in charge of a lifeboat. Hichens's blunt manner of speaking, his apparent frankness and his extreme London accent lent a touch of human interest to his testimony, and he obviously commanded the respect and confidence of the naval experts who were listening to the proceedings.

Harold G. Lowe, the Titanic's fifth officer, gave testimony in which he corroborated many of the former statements, gave the details of the launching of the boats in his immediate vicinity, but added little or nothing to the fund of information. The witness made it plain that all were free to wander wherever they pleased, and that there was no effort made by the officers or crew to coerce the passengers. When asked by Senator Smith if he saw women upon the deck where he was working as the last boats were going away, Mr. Lowe replied: "Certainly I saw women, but I did not have time to go and drag them away. They didn't respond to our call." The problem of who fired the shots which have been so frequently spoken of was cleared up by Mr. Lowe, who said that he fired three shots into the water to scare away some immigrants on one of the decks, who, he feared, were about to swamp a loaded boat by jumping. He was certain the shots struck no one.

The next day of the inquiry was devoted almost entirely to the subject of wireless telegraphy. Operator Cottam of the Carpathia was again on the stand and supported the testimony of Bride, the Titanic's operator, in connection with the Frankfurt incident. It was brought out that all the wireless operators were in sympathy with those of the Titanic, who warned the German operator to keep out. They were agreed that it was often difficult for operators speaking different languages to understand one another's signals readily. The sale of their accounts of the disaster by the wireless operators was made the subject of questions addressed to Mr. Marconi. The legitimacy of their action in thus holding their stories for one newspaper has been severely questioned.

The identity of the ship which was so near the Titanic has been a matter for searching inquiry. Captain Stanley Lord of the Californian testified that he believed his vessel could not have been more than nineteen or twenty miles from the Titanic. It was brought out that some aboard the Californian believed they had seen the Titanic's signal rockets but they had not reported this to the captain, who said in his testimony that the Californian did not receive the wireless call for aid until it was relayed from the Virginian at six o'clock next morning. He stated that he had seen no signals and was convinced that the Titanic was beyond their range of vision. The Californian's wireless operator testified that at five minutes after nine he was instructed to send to the Titanic the fact that the Californian had stopped because of ice, and to give the location. He began his message, but was cut off by the Titanic's operator, who flashed back, "Shut up; I am talking to Cape Race. You are jamming my messages." After this he listened for a time to the Titanic's long distance work, then, slipping off his headgear, went to bed. It was not until early the next morning that he received the news that the Titanic had gone down.

Captain Moore of the Canadian liner Mount Temple, having been accused of receiving the signals and paying no attention to them, rushed to Washington to clear himself before the Senate committee. This he had little difficulty in doing, for his operator was evidently a young man of methodical ways and had kept an exact record, not only of messages to and from the Mount Temple, but also of the various messages which were in the air and which his apparatus had picked up. Captain Moore submitted these as evidence and told his story, stating that he had received the Titanic's call for help when he was about fifty miles away. He started immediately to rush to the rescue, but was headed off by a long field of dangerous ice, which he did not dare to attempt to navigate in the darkness. Early next morning he saw the Carpathia across the icefield and was told by her that all the Titanic's lifeboats and survivors had been picked up.

Captain Moore stated that within his view from the bridge he discerned a strange steamer, probably a tramp, which was making her way out of the ice. There was also a schooner in sight. The lights of this schooner, he thought, probably were those seen by the anxious survivors of the Titanic, and which they were frantically trying to reach. Captain Moore, by the recital of his long and successful career as a navigator, and by his evident ability, made a very favorable impression upon the investigating committee.

One of the stewards who was put upon the stand told further stories of the loading of the lifeboats and of the awakening of the passengers. It was not until half past twelve, or fifty minutes after the crash, that the stewards were ordered to arouse their passengers. He told how all in his section went upon deck, and how his last act aboard the ship was to assist William T. Stead to put on a lifebelt.

Another steward told of assisting Officer Pitman and Mr. Ismay to launch boat No. 7. Mr. Ismay kept calling out, "Men, form a line and let the ladies through," while First Officer Murdock was shouting, "Ladies, this way. Are there any other ladies here before this boat is lowered?" A woman came along, said the steward, just before the boat was lowered, and Mr. Ismay called to her to get in. "I am only a stewardess, sir," she said, and the answer was, "It makes no difference; you're a woman. Take your place." This steward was later ordered into boat No. 5 which was in charge of Officer Pitman. The last words he heard spoken on the ship were those of Mr. Murdock, who shook hands with Pitman, saying, "Good-by, old man, good luck."

All through the last days of the inquiry greater interest centered around the arrival of the cable steamer Mackay-Bennett at Halifax than about the Senate committee. Each day brought the news that a few more bodies had been recovered from the deep until the total reached 306. Only 190 of these were brought to shore; the rest were buried at sea. Fifty-seven of those were among the identified dead, while 60 of the bodies brought to Halifax were unidentified at the time of landing. Captain Lardner of the cable steamer stated that most of those who were buried out there were members of the Titanic's crew. He said none of the more prominent men had been recommitted to the deep, as it seemed best to bring back to land the dead in cases where questions of large inheritance and long litigation might be involved. The Rev. Canon Hind, of Halifax, who went out with the Mackay-Bennett on her five-day search, conducted the burial services at sea.

Halifax, during the days of waiting as well as after the arrival of the ship, was a city of mourning. Large numbers of friends and relatives of the victims of the disaster had gathered to await the bringing in of the bodies. Many waited in acute suspense, for their hopes of recovering their dead were founded on the slenderest evidence. As the funeral ship came into the harbor she was greeted by the tolling of all the city's bells and the flying of all the flags at half mast. The little crowd on the dock was limited almost entirely to those indirectly connected with the tragedy, so that confusion and hysterical scenes were avoided. The remains when taken from the Mackay-Bennett were placed in the Mayflower Curling Rink, which had been divided into compartments and entirely draped in black and white.

In both England and America funds have been started for the erection of monuments to the heroic dead and for the relief of those survivors who find themselves stripped of practically all their worldly possessions. Subscriptions have poured in from individuals and business firms all over the world, and the two funds, that of London and that of New York, now total nearly $2,000,000, and it is confidently expected will reach $2,500,000.

Memorial services for those who perished have been held in many cities of the United States and Canada. In New York a great congregation gathered at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on Sunday, April 21, and Bishop Greer spoke earnestly of the courage shown by the men who died. Impressive services were conducted at St. Thomas's and St. Bartholomew's, where the grief was specially marked, because a number of those who were lost were members of the congregations.

A Strange Senatorial Outburst

WHILE most people are disposed to grant a wide latitude to the average political speaker in the heat of debate, there are few who will hesitate to stamp as in execrable taste the parody on the Apostles' Creed which Senator John Sharp Williams introduced as a part of his remarks during a discussion in the Upper House in Washington lately. Senator Williams was reciting the political beliefs of Theodore Roosevelt and employed the travesty on the doctrines of the Christian Church in an attempt at witticism which was as inexcusable as it was startling. What his senatorial associates must have thought of it is not recorded; they made no open protest; but such a rank offense against all the accepted canons of parliamentary good taste, apart from the sacrilegious character of the incident, deserves to be sharply rebuked. We know nothing of the Senator's religious views—or if he has any at all—but a single gleam of common sense and decency might well have prevented such an utterance from a member of the highest legislative body in the nation.

Pastors and the Indian Schools

IN THEIR resolutions adopted at a recent meeting in that city, the pastors of Washington have sounded a very significant note of warning to the Protestant churches of the country. They met to discuss the action of President Taft in revoking the order of Commissioner Valentine of the Indian Bureau in regard to the religious garb of the Sisters in the Indian schools and the use of Catholic emblems and the prevalence of Catholic teaching in these government-supported institutions. These resolutions are reproduced below:

> We earnestly protest against the recent revocation by President Taft of the order of Commissioner Valentine, whereby the priests and nuns employed in teaching in the Indian public schools were forbidden to wear any distinctive religious garb or insignia while on duty in the public school-rooms. The action of Commissioner Valentine was the correction of a long-standing abuse, against which protests had been earnest and indignant, and was wise, patriotic and constitutional. The action of the President is a profound disappointment to the great majority of the Christian citizenship of the republic. It is un-American and a complete surrender of the essential principle of our national life, which ordains the separation of the church and state. Associated with the fact that the United States Congress annually gives large appropriations of money and often patents in fee for mission lands to the Roman Catholic bureau of missions, the President adds the immense influence of his name and office to the work of converting the Indians to Roman Catholicism.

These resolutions have been transmitted to the President, the Secretary of the Interior (to whom Mr. Taft's letter of revocation was addressed), Commissioner Valentine and the Committee on Judiciary of the House of Representatives. Meanwhile, up to May 1 no decision had been reached by Secretary Fisher, and the whole question is allowed, by the President's expressed desire, to remain in suspense. A hearing was given by the Secretary on April 8, at which a printed brief by Charles J. Bonaparte, counsel for the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, defending the Catholic usage in the schools, was submitted. A reply brief by the Protestant Home Missions Council has been prepared, in which it is clearly shown that the usage involves a violation of an essential principle in our national life—the separation of church and state. On various occasions, the President has expressed his full belief in this principle of our Constitution. It is upheld by so many distinguished authorities that the soundness of the contention in its support is beyond question. In a recent case in Pennsylvania, the Supreme Court held the principle in question was violated by > the introduction into the schools as teachers of persons who are by their striking and distinctive ecclesiastical robes necessarily and constantly asserting their membership in a particular church, and in a religious order within that church.

This would apply to any church—Romanist, Protestant, Salvation Army or Quakers—or to any distinctive religious sect. The individuals in question are not disqualified by their religion, their church membership or their ecclesiastical office, but by their open assertion, in garb, insignia and sectarian practice, while on duty as government employees.

We will not discuss now the various schemes and expedients suggested by the defenders of this unconstitutional usage for the purpose of securing its continuance indefinitely. We may have occasion to refer to these later. Meanwhile, the American people are asking why this great question, involving a serious violation of constitutional rights, is permitted to remain undecided. All the official amenities, to which the President seems to attach so much importance, have been satisfied. Decisions on the identical point, handed down by the highest courts, have made the path of duty clear as the noonday sun. The Indian school question should be decided now—not after election.

A New Line on Political Ethics

WHICHEVER way the presidential battle may go, it will surely leave a trail of incidents to be remembered. To the unbiased and independent observer, the struggle at the primaries in the Old Bay State seems to have had all the stage accessories of bands, barrels and stirring eloquence, with the single drawback of a very badly arranged ballot. And therein lay the mischief, for the count, after throwing out a mass of defective ballots, showed that while President Taft had carried the preferential primaries and had won a majority of the district delegates, the result was a tie, Roosevelt having all of the eight delegates-at-large. By all the recognized rules of the political game, he was entitled to claim these delegates; but he chose rather to decline them absolutely, and so he tossed them back to Mr. Taft with a fine dramatic flourish, explaining in a very straightforward way that he did so purely out of his love for fair play and a "square deal," refusing to take what he regarded as an undue advantage. It was done in the characteristic off-hand Rooseveltian way, and to some it had the aspect of "playing to the galleries." There are plenty of others, however, who give the Colonel credit for an effort to introduce a higher standard of ethics in national politics, which would be welcome no matter from what source it came. Meanwhile, the drawn battle in Massachusetts, following closely on other recent surprises, has driven the political trainers back to the stables where the "dark horses" are being industriously groomed. They know that too much strenuosity at the outset may leave a candidate without the running power necessary for the finish. As it stands, it is still anybody's struggle. Speaker Clark's friends are hopeful and many are wondering whether the outcome of present political conditions will not be a Democratic triumph.

The Land of Summer

THE coming of summer is always full of suggestion and invitation. Poets, lovers, sportsmen, children, look forward with glee to its fragrances, its beauties and its opportunities; busy people in the city anticipate wistfully the breathing-spell their short vacation brings, and begin to enjoy even the furtive glimpses they may catch of field or sea; dwellers in the country settle down for the severer toil, but the intensified joys of the life that is "near to nature's heart."

And for the Christian? Summer is a good time for entering into the fragrant and gladsome places of religious experience. Many estimable Christians have, after all, an experience that has a good deal of winter about it. They are very busy, and very careful, and—sometimes—very cold, and now and then, it is to be feared, almost gloomy. But there is a summer land for the soul. The old prophets are full of the most alluring invitations to enter a spiritual land where there are flowers and radiances and delicious fruits. It is not selfish to seek and to find and to inhabit that land, for every new dweller there makes one more inducement, one more advertisement, one more agent, to bring others to the place of midsummer gladness.

> For ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace: the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall clap their hands. Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle-tree; and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off.

Here is the Christian's summer song; and he may sing it all the year round:

> I've reached the land of corn and wine,
> And all its riches now are mine.
> Here shines undimmed one blissful day,
> For all my night has passed away.
>
> The Saviour comes and walks with me,
> And sweet communion here have we.
> He gently leads me by his hand,
> For this is heaven's borderland.

Parcels Post on the Way

IT HAS been long demanded and slow in coming, but at last it is fairly in sight. In the Post Office Appropriation Bill passed by the House of Representatives on May 2, there was included a provision for the establishment of an experimental parcels post. Under this law, the Post Office Department will conduct for two years an experimental parcels post on routes that are strictly rural. Eleven pounds is to be the maximum weight of any package for postage, and the rates are to be five cents for the first pound and one cent for each additional pound. At the next session of Congress, it is promised that a more complete parcels post bill will be submitted, and the House authorizes the appointment of a special joint committee of six members, three by the Speaker and three by the Vice-President, to deal with the subject thoroughly and prepare such a measure as will meet all public needs.

The Children of the Poor

IN a few weeks THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, Nyack-on-the-Hudson, will reopen for its regular summer work. This beautiful Home, which is everywhere known as "the Children's Paradise," has now been in operation for eighteen years and is the most widely known benevolence of its kind in the United States. Since the first opening it has received and sheltered 35,000 little tenement children—boys and girls of the poorest families, who have no other means of getting an outing. The Home is wholly the product of the generosity of our CHRISTIAN HERALD readers and their friends throughout the country. Three dollars covers the entire cost of a ten days' outing for a child at Mont-Lawn, transportation included. But even the smallest contributions are welcomed.

When making your plans for your summer holiday, and as you look around at your own happy household faces and think of all the benefits they enjoy, just give one thought to the multitude of other children who are not so fortunately situated and to whom your gift may mean the bringing back of health and strength. You can, if you will, bring down "a section of heaven into the heart of a little child," and your summer will be sweetened and made more delightful by the recollection of what you have done. All contributions should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

A Benefactor Dead

DR. DANIEL K. PEARSONS, the eccentric philanthropist and millionaire who gave away between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000 to small schools and colleges and to home and foreign missions and other enterprises of the church, died of pneumonia at the Hinsdale Sanitarium near Chicago on April 27, in his ninety-third year. He was born at Bradford, Vt., in 1820. He attended the village school, supported himself while a student of Dartmouth College, graduated in medicine and was a country doctor at the age of forty. Having saved $5,000 in his medical practice, he went to Chicago, entered the real estate commission business, and then at the suggestion of his wife he acquired vast tracts of timber lands in Michigan, out of which he made millions. He made wise investments in street-car and other properties in Chicago, including one hundred houses. Twenty-two years ago he concluded to give away his fortune. "When I die," Dr. Pearsons said a year ago, "I shall not be rich in money, but I am rich in the joy of doing good. Mrs. Pearsons and I had no children of our own, but Providence gave us a large family of children in the Christian colleges of the country. There are forty-seven of them which I think I can call my own, and they are scattered now in twenty-four States." Among them are Beloit, Berea, Newberry, Whitman, Huron, Piedmont, Northland, Highland, Doane, McKendree, Colorado, Mount Holyoke, Lake Forest, Knox, Drury, Yankton, Carleton, Fargo, Pomona, Fairmount, Illinois, Olivet, Marietta, Sheridan, Anatolia, Northwestern, Guilford, Washington, Parkville, Pacific, Grand, each receiving from $10,000 to $500,000. He gave large sums also to seminaries, to domestic and foreign missions, to the Y. M. C. A., to hospitals, etc. His wife died several years ago. A year ago he sold out his house and furnishings and gave away his last cent and went to an institution, where he supported himself on $5,000, which was a two per cent. annuity he had reserved in a gift of $250,000 to keep him to the end. He was a typical Yankee, industrious, severely frugal, educated, honest. Such sterling thrift and character had much to do in building Chicago, Minneapolis, and many cities of the Northwest. His struggle with poverty prompted his democratic spirit to aid the smaller institutions which the millionaires were inclined to overlook. He was an ideal man and true Christian in his beautiful benevolence and fervent piety. Recognizing his divine stewardship, the supreme blessedness of giving, he died a multimillionaire in personal worth, love, faith and immortality. What was said at George Peabody's English statue can be said of Dr. Pearsons: "What I spent I had. What I left I lost. What I gave away I have still."

If thou wilt be perfect, go sell that thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come and follow me. (Matt. 10: 21.)

The Result of the Cyclone at Grant Park, Ill.

Terrible Tornadoes in West

A SUCCESSION of storms every few days has swept over various parts of the country, especially in the West, overturning houses, carrying railroad trains from the tracks, and causing the loss of millions of dollars of property and many scores of precious lives. Among the most disastrous of these cyclones were the ones at Grant Park, Ill., in twenty towns of Oklahoma, at North Loup, Neb., and at Kirkland, Tex. Butler and Foss, Okla., are said to have been wrecked. There are catastrophes of nature that human wisdom can guard against—the burning volcano, the tidal waves on the ocean shore, etc. But the awful tornadoes that sweep past so suddenly cannot well be protected against. They are emblematic of those storms in the mental, moral and religious world that leave some ruin in their train, but which are used by Providence to awaken the slothful. The heart of the nation goes out in sympathy for the people who have suffered by these cyclones, and especially for the survivors of the loved ones so suddenly snatched away to a land unswept by storm, unspoiled by death, and in a prayer that the spiritual refuge to which the prophet referred may be theirs:

Thou hast been a refuge from the storm, a shadow from the heat when the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall (Isa. 25:4.)

London's Eccentric Sausage King

MR. WILLIAM HARRIS, who for a quarter of a century in London, has been known as the "Sausage King," is dead. He could neither read nor write, but had great native ability and genius for business of a high order. He amassed one of the most princely fortunes among the merchants of London. He intended to perpetuate his name, and called all three of his sons William after himself. He designated them as No. 1, 2 and 3. He named his three daughters Elizabeth, No. 1, 2 and 3. The Sausage King was summoned for not sending his son William to school, and he took his three Williams to the magistrate's office to find out which was the delinquent. It was the eldest. The father said he had cut out the boy for a sausage manufacturer, and he thought he could learn that business in his shop better than in school. The father was fined fifty cents and said the advertising he got was worth $100,000 to him. He was a master at advertising. A pig winning the Derby with Harris, senior, on his back decorated all his carts and some of his shop signs. In all weathers, summer and winter, night and day, he always wore a dress suit, an opera hat and patent leather shoes, while a huge diamond worth $1,200 blazed in his shirt-bosom. Mr. Harris was a very liberal man. Every Christmas he sent a package of sausage to each policeman and fireman in London. He gave tons of meat to the poor. In the moral and religious world it would be well if people could only have the singleness of purpose of Mr. Harris. He started out with many handicaps to make sausage, make it better and more of it than anybody else, and he did so and won the title of "Sausage King," answering to the picture of the wise man:

Seest thou a man diligent in his business? He shall stand before kings. (Prov. 22: 29.)

The Late Dr. Daniel K. Pearsons

Mountain Named After Woman

EXPLORER AMUNDSEN in his discovery of the South Pole came upon a magnificent mountain which he named Mount Gade, after a warm friend. Amundsen before sailing on his voyage toward the Pole was entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Gade, warm personal friends in New York City, and he told Mrs. Gade that if he found the Pole he would bring her back a souvenir. So instead he named the magnificent mountain found in the polar regions after her, and from Tasmania, two weeks after the discovery, he wrote her a letter informing her of the honor conferred. For centuries the memory of this woman will be preserved by the compliment of the explorer. There is a woman whose name will be preserved forever—the one that anointed the feet of her Lord with a vase of sweet perfume, and wiped them with the hair of her head.

Wheresoever this Gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her. (Matt. 26: 13.)

Swearing Rebuked by Irony

REV. ALBERT M. HYDE, of the Porter Congregational Church of Brockton, Mass., astounded the public by announcing that in the coming Sunday sermon he would give ten reasons why every respectable, thinking man should swear just as often and as hard as he can. At the service he gave the following ten reasons for swearing: 1. Because it is such an elegant way of expressing one's thoughts. 2. Because it is such a conclusive proof of taste and good breeding. 3. Because it is a sure way of making one's self agreeable to one's friends. 4. Because it is a positive evidence of acquaintance with good literature. 5. Because it furnishes such a good example and training for young boys. 6. Because it is just what a man's mother enjoys having her son do. 7. Because it would look so nice in print. 8. Because it is such a good way of increasing one's self-respect. 9. Because it is such a help to manhood and virtue in many ways. 10. Because it is such an infallible way of improving one's chances in the hereafter. Some of the sober old-fashioned people who do not expect their pastor to be trivial or funny, or who do not have in them the sense of humor, sarcasm, or irony, thought the minister was in earnest and in favor of swearing. Some said to themselves that there was so much nonsense and ridicule of parts of the Bible nowadays in some pulpits, that they might expect any surprise. The irony of Dr. Hyde was the most powerful rebuke of the folly and sin of blasphemy.

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain. (Ex. 20: 7.)

BRIDES AND WEDDING GIFTS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Bridal Gifts

ENGAGEMENTS in these days are seldom announced until the date of the wedding is provisionally set. If a girl and a man are not anticipating marriage for a period of several years, it is as well that there should be no formal announcement of their intentions beyond the immediate circle of their respective families and intimate friends. The rule has its exceptions, but in most cases it seems wise to defer the announcement of an engagement to the world in general until the wedding is somewhere within sight. Of course an engagement ring on the finger of a young woman advertises the promise she has made to those who see the sparkling jewel and suspect by whom it was placed there.

A betrothal is a fit occasion for the congratulations of friends, and as every one rejoices in the happiness of the young, every one who wishes to show by a tangible token that the engagement has given pleasure and suggested good wishes hastens to select a betrothal present. For this purpose nothing is as appropriate as a cup and saucer. This homely yet beautiful adjunct of the tea table is a pledge of hospitality and of the domestic graces. It makes one think of the cabalistic word "Swastika." This symbol survives from antiquity as the most ancient device carrying with it the idea of home and hearth. Cups and saucers are ancient too. We read of them in the earliest literature that has come down to us through the ages, and we find specimens of them among the curios and antiques of the Greeks and Romans, Babylonians and Persians. Early in the history of the world a cup must have been a necessity in the comfort of household life.

The exquisite picture on this page is an artist's happy thought. The composition is charming in its simplicity and realism, and the girl who is holding her saucer to the light and rejoicing over her new possession shows in every line of her figure and in the sweetness of her face that she is a home daughter, full of youth and health and in love with life. We are glad to think that somebody is in love with her, and we hope that he is worthy.

Room for a large variety of choice makes the selection of bridal gifts an easy task. A shower may be of linen, china, stockings, handkerchiefs or kitchen utensils. Individual gifts are always welcome, and their value to the bride is measured by sentiment and not by dollars and cents. Those who have long purses and are nearly related may bestow upon a bride a supply of flat silver, inclusive of spoons, forks, knives and whatever else is for ordinary use on the home table. They may go farther than this and give articles of beauty and use, such as cake and fruit baskets, silver teapots and bowls, and whatever else the dazzling array in the shop of the silversmith presents to view. The bride should be left free to engrave her silver at her discretion. Occasionally articles are duplicated and triplicated, and no one should feel hurt if in such a case an exchange is made for something else after the wedding. Bridal silver should be marked with the maiden initials or monogram of the bride. A shower has an advantage in the opportunity it affords a number of friends to unite in conferring distinction on one they love. The hostess on such an occasion invites her guest of honor, but need not of necessity tell her of the intended pleasure. It may be, at least partially, a surprise. Each gift should be folded or wrapped in tissue paper and tied with narrow ribbon. The card of the giver with a sentiment, jest or happy allusion should be attached, and the gifts when showered on their recipient call from her an expression of thanks.

A New Departure in Matrimony

POPULAR interest has been aroused and considerable discussion caused by the decision of the Bishop of Chicago in reference to a health certificate from both contracting parties as an essential preliminary to the performance of the rite of marriage by the clergymen of his diocese. Many prominent men and women conspicuous in social reforms endorse this action of the bishop, and are doing what they can to promote its general acceptance. A measure, providing that a certificate of health signed by a reputable physician shall be presented to a minister before he marries a couple, has been introduced into the legislature of Rhode Island and handed to a committee for consideration.

The advantages consequent upon this new departure, should it take on legal authority, are sufficiently obvious. Disease transmitted to offspring visits the sins of the fathers upon the third and fourth generation of the children. There are few of us who have not witnessed the spectacle of an inherited malady invading the peace and happiness of a home and sweeping one victim after another into an inevitable grave. Delinquency in morals, deficiency of mental and physical force, infirmities of all sorts follow in the wake of a taint in the blood. It would seem that as marriage is the means of carrying on the race, those who contemplate its union should be at pains to be free from the danger of disease and able, so far as possible, to call into being healthy children well fitted to bear the burdens of the modern day.

On the other hand, one hesitates to be quite satisfied with the elimination of sentiment proposed in this cold and scientific way regarding love. A man meets a beautiful woman and is ready to barter the world for her hand. A girl may be in apparently perfect health, and yet may have concealed in the recesses of her physical nature a tendency to consumption or some other heart-breaking malady and be unaware of her peril. The man who loves her, should he discover that there was a lurking germ, her legacy from her mother or grandmother or grandfather, would seem to the common view ruthless in cruelty if he set his love aside and looked for another mate for a reason like this.

The Question of Domestic Help

NOT long ago an extremely capable and efficient woman who had lived in one family almost ten years, giving entire satisfaction and lifting the burden of domestic work from her employer, set about looking for another place. The step on her part was made necessary by the removal of the family to another city. To her surprise and theirs, she discovered that her long stay in a single situation was regarded with disfavor by one or two persons to whom she applied. One lady declared that she feared to engage a cook who had stayed so long in her place because she would probably wish to rule the house. Another found it difficult to believe that a maid could fully fill every requisite of an ordinary situation and yet have time to read in the afternoon, do her own sewing and go out in the evening when her work was done.

The fact is that too many mistresses expect too much from maids in the line of dependence. In other words, they exact a slavish attention to routine that is fatal to success. If a woman is a good laundress and cook, she should be left free to follow her own methods provided the results are satisfactory. No one should be expected to work from early dawn until ten o'clock every night without a break for rest in the day or evening. The woman in the kitchen is human and her humanity should be recognized. A long term of service ought to be a certificate of merit.

The Working Girls' Club

A WORKING girls' club recently organized in a factory town under the supervision and motherly care of several friendly women has puzzled the latter not a little. These young women, being mostly factory operatives at low wages, begin their work at seven in the morning and finish at half past five in the afternoon. They have a recess at noon. A number of them walk long distances between their homes and their work twice a day. This gives them a chance for fresh air and exercise, and yet when night comes they are very tired and show their fatigue in jaded looks, pallid color and an inability to remain quiet. They have had no training in the art of paying attention, but they are amiable and respond quickly when efforts are made to amuse them.

The ladies feel that their aim should be to instruct and elevate these girls, and they are at a loss where to draw the line between simple diversion and elementary education. They would find their problem less difficult should they ask themselves how much time they would be willing to spend in severe mental effort if they had been working at a strenuous and monotonous task all day long. There are times when fun is as wholesome as food, and when religion is best served by merriment and laughter.

An amusing story, songs that have a ringing refrain, and games in which all can join are good prescriptions for these girls, some of whom have never had much playtime and know very little about gaiety and the innocent frivolity that is the birthright of the young.

THE BLUE CUP

From the painting by Joseph De Camp

So this is what Nellie has sent me
In token of greetings and love—
A cup and a saucer for prizing
My costliest treasures above.
She heard of the happiness coming
So swiftly to Jamie and me,
And she sends us good wishes beforehand
In time for the pouring of tea.

Translucent the cup and the saucer,
And blue as the sky in its hue,
And she knows we are clear as the sunbeams
And sure to be faithful and true.
'Tis the cup that is sign of betrothal,
And Nellie's a darling to send
A present so rare and so precious,
With love from the heart of a friend.

Why He Likes the Almanac

I am indeed pleased to write this letter of acceptance for your Almanac for 1912. I find it a volume of indispensable information, religiously, legally and secularly. It richly merits a place in every library, and most especially the pastor's study. Please accept my highest appreciation and thanks for this praiseworthy volume. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is a welcome visitor each week. It is pregnant with wholesome thoughts and ideas.

IN HOLY LAND

BY ALICE GARLAND STEELE

THEY had met, all of them, at the Hotel du Parc in Jaffa, and after the manner of American tourists in an alien land, they had traveled together in a warm friendliness, for the roads that Cook had appointed. They had journeyed on donkeys to Jerusalem and Nazareth and Bethany, had watched the sunset on Olivet and rested in Jericho, but now, with a delightful irresponsibility that ignored Cook altogether, they were going over into "the country beyond Jordan."

They were an interesting little cavalcade as they waited the word to start. Dorothea, being fresh from her college, in the spirit of analysis and as an easy method of identification, had classified them all: the Doctor, the Certain Rich Man, Bathsheba his wife (they came from Chicago), and St. Stephen and the Angel. Her aunt and herself she left out, for that was all in the family.

She sat on her donkey's back, watching the Doctor and their dragoman, Youssouf the Silent, tightening girths and packsaddles, while the dragoman gave his slow orders in Arabic to the lazy drivers who loafed by the roadside. Her aunt, fat and forty, bore the look of one who rode to martyrdom. The whole Mediterranean trip had been against her advice and desire, and now this overland jaunt, through desolate country, with people they scarcely knew, this business of sleeping in a tent and dining without hotel dinners, made her realize tearfully how easily Dorothea set aside authority and followed her own whimsical will! It was another proof that college for women was entirely a mistake.

Presently the Doctor sauntered over to the girl. "Well," he said cheerfully, "five minutes more and we start."

She drew down the corners of her mouth. "Hospital time, or Youssouf's?" and he said, "Oh, Youssouf's!" and then they both laughed.

"I'm glad," she said. "It's almost like an adventure, isn't it, to go out of the beaten tracks like this? I've been glad ever since we left the hotel yesterday. I just hated Jerusalem." And he said, "Now, that's strange; so did I, though not for the same reason."

She smiled. "Oh, I know yours—poor drainage, flies, and no plumbing to speak of!" But he shook his head.

"You're wrong. Lack of room and stale cigar smoke and garlic in the cooking!" and she said "Oh!" and curled her red lips. "Why don't you live up to your profession?"

"I will," he laughed, "when I can live on it!"

"Mine," she admitted, "was that I grew tired to death of Mahommed. It was 'Allah! Allah akbar!' from morning till night! I never realized before how truly 'Christian' I am!"

"That's because," he said gravely, "you are flying your flag in the enemy's country—it always makes us love it more."

She nodded. "Yes, I know, but of all of us, the one who really cares is your friend, St. Stephen."

"Oh," he said, "Stephen! Yes, I guess it's 'Holy Land' to him all right!" and then he colored. "I'm going to ask you a favor. If—if he ever says anything about Medical Missions don't contradict him, will you?" and he looked at her suddenly.

She smiled. "I know, there's some secret about it, isn't there? Are you really 'Medical Examiner' for Syria, and does he have to take all those notes?"

He flicked his dusty boots with his riding-whip. "He was a college chum of mine," he said. "I took up medicine, he went into the church. He's been for eight years with that little wife of his, starving in a small mining town in the Northwest. It was slowly killing him, and—well, she wrote to—"

"Yes?" she said, but it was a question.

"There was just one chance for him," he said gruffly; "a sea-trip; he had always dreamed of coming here, and—well, he came as my secretary."

Suddenly she looked into his eyes. "I know now. You made yourself 'Inspector' to—to give him his chance!" but he only colored, and finally she looked away to where St. Stephen sat astride his silly little donkey, with his somber eyes on the line of salmon-color above the gray hills. "I think," she said, as Youssouf by a gesture bade them start, "it is 'Holy Land' after all!" and then they ambled slowly onward.

It was stony ground; here and there above them a slope was covered with crooked olive-trees, but as they traversed the winding road under a garish sunlight the way grew steeper and more bare of verdure, with here and there a patch of sand streaked with dashes of vivid scarlet.

"'There is one God . . . who is love'"

"We shall find more of it," said the Doctor, "on the shores of the Dead Sea," and Dorothea shivered a little at the name.

They were to have lunch out in the open, by an old Roman bridge, a bridge ignored by tourists, but good for a safe crossing, Youssouf assured them. Afterward, they were to touch the rim of the Dead Sea and dip into that mysterious Eastern Valley where the Moab hills raise their silent barriers to the brutal desert beyond, and at dusk, somewhere along the eastern shores of the Jordan, they would "make camp," to watch the Oriental pattern of the stars, and sleep like children in a land grown old.

"Good gracious, Dorothea, you do go so much faster than is necessary!" and Dorothea and the Doctor stopped till her aunt came up.

"Doctor," went on that lady puffing, "I should think donkey-riding would be very bad for the heart!" and he said seriously, "Oh, it is, Mrs. Weldon," and looked across at Dorothea.

"Then why, for heaven's sake, do you do it?" but she didn't wait for his answer. "I think it was altogether unwise, this trip," she protested; "they say the Dead Sea is an awful place, and that the Eastern Valley is infested with savage tribes who live in the mountains—and here we are at the mercy of Youssouf and four donkey-boys!"

The Doctor laughed. "Oh, Youssouf is all right; the record of his virtues is as long as the Koran! And the Bedouins will not harm us, I'll warrant you that!"

"You can't warrant anything," she sniffed, "in this outlandish country, not even a clean bill of health! But at any rate, Doctor, I do wish that Chicago person would take off her jewels—she wears diamonds even in her lorgnon!"

"Aunt dear," said Dorothea, "you are jealous." But the Doctor only laughed.

"Youssouf!" he called, and the dragoman pattered slowly backward. "Tell the ladies their watches are safe, Youssouf. They fear the Bedouins."

Youssouf craned his bent neck forward, smiling. "It is a fast-day of the Christians," he said briefly; "surely their God will look out for their watches, whether they ride or pray! Nevertheless," he added wisely, "it would be as well to help matters. One might hide them under that flat stone, or in the donkey's ears!" and he made a grave salaam.

The Doctor waved him away. "They are all insolent," he said, "these Mohammedans. All the same, perhaps we had better suggest to Mrs. Blair that the glitter is alluring."

"I'll tell her," smiled Dorothea, and beckoned with her little whip. "Oh, Mrs. Blair!" and as Bathsheba came up with her rather fleshy lord the girl bent forward mysteriously.

"Do you know, Mrs. Blair, you are going to be kidnapped?"

Mrs. Blair, a highly-colored blonde, stared speechless. "Good gracious! Me?"

Dorothea nodded. "For your diamonds, Mrs. Blair. You see, the rest of us have none!"

Mrs. Blair, paling, dropped her grip on the check-rein. "But, my dear, I shall take them off at once!" and she nervously divested herself of lorgnon, brooch, and earrings, beautiful long earrings that glittered like dewdrops. "And I have more," she cried; "I have a whole chamois-skin full in my vanity-bag!"

"Dearme!" said Dorothea; "what a dreadful risk you were running!" and appealed to the Doctor.

"Doctor Travis, what shall poor Mrs. Blair do? Oughtn't she to try—the donkey's ears?"

"If the lady will listen to a son of the true Prophet," said Youssouf's voice, she will trust them to the holy man who keeps his eyes on the hills about Jerusalem!"

"Rascal!" said the Doctor, "go back to your donkey-boys!" And he repeated under his breath. "They are all insolent, these fellows." But Mrs. Blair obstinately held to Youssouf's suggestion, and Youssouf hung in the background with the passive air of one who knew.

"He is right," she said hurriedly; "do get the clergyman to carry them, Doctor. See—I will put them all in the little sandalwood box we bought yesterday in David Street, and he can slip them into his coat-tail!" And Dorothea clapped her hands. "Do, Dr. Travis; it is the best hiding-place in the world!"

"There is an old Arab proverb," echoed Youssouf, "'Never tell the well that it is deep!' Let the holy man walk in peace and know not the value of his coat-tail!" At which they laughed, and Youssouf, gliding forward, started up the procession again.

It was Dorothea after all who took the sandalwood box and rode back to where St. Stephen and the Angel loitered by the wayside.

"I was just looking at the olive-trees," he said, smiling faintly; "they are all of them crooked. It is a perverse land, Miss Dorothea, and yet here One walked who made crooked ways straight! Some day his touch will shape even the olive-trees."

"I know," she said gently; "you are always seeing things we do not."

"It is Holy Land," he said, and his pale face lighted as he turned it upon her, but she had trotted around to his wife's side, and he sighed and dropped his eyes to the little bluets that bloomed along the road.

"Do you not think he looks stronger?" The little woman in shabby gray had a note of anxiety in her voice that Dorothea hastened to reassure.

"Oh, yes, indeed—there is nothing like a sea-trip." There was a warm thought in her heart of the Doctor's little deception. And then, floundering with her emotions, she began to talk of Mrs. Blair's sandalwood box.

"Couldn't you just slip it into his pocket?" she said. "It is all a joke, but aunt got worried. There isn't a bit of danger—Dr. Travis has been over this road before and Youssouf is the best dragoman in Jerusalem. He has planned the whole route for us. He told the doctor in Arabic it was 'safe for all but cowards.' But it was fun to see Mrs. Blair! Her husband never said a word. I suppose if she lost them he'd buy her more—I call him the 'Certain Rich Man,' for his pocket-book is the most certain thing I know."

The little wife's eyes brightened. "What a clever girl you are!" she said admiringly, and Dorothea leaned over on impulse and kissed her.

"I call you the 'Angel,'" she said, "which is a fitting name for St. Stephen's wife, now, isn't it?" And they laughed as girls together.

There was a red flush on the little wife's cheek as she turned to her husband. "Stephen, dear," she said, "you are dreaming again, and Miss Dorothea wants to be talked to!" and as he turned she put out her arm and slipped Bathsheba's box into his coat pocket, and he, with the message of the olive-trees still in his mind, took no heed.

"I think we had better get on," she said. "Dr. Travis wants us to keep together." And they quickened pace till they reached the rest. Ahead they could see Youssouf, a white-clad figure beside the brown donkey-boys, and catch the silver sound of the foremost pack-animals' little tinkling bells.

Three hours later, luncheon and the crossing accomplished, they stood, awed and silent, on the "other side." The sunshine had died in sudden shadow; at their feet the Dead Sea lifted its pallid gray face, and Dorothea imagined it stamped with the bitterness of all the years! Bathsheba alone refused to be impressed.

"If that's all it is," she said, "I can't see why people rave so about it. I'd sooner have Lake Michigan any time!" and her husband said, admiringly, "That's so, Dell, it ain't so lonely, at any rate."

Mrs. Weldon, staring at the smooth-ground pebbles and the rusty sands, shook her head. "I don't see why on earth we came at all!" she said with tearful emphasis. "I'm sure I never want to see Syria again—it's either dirty and huddled or green and lonesome! But it's just like Dorothea."

"Goodness, aunt!" cried Dorothea, "you don't mean that?" and Mrs. Weldon flushed and said irritably, "You do pick one up so, Dorothy," but the doctor muttered audibly that he "didn't think she did."

Dorothea, mounting her donkey again, heard it, and also heard Bathsheba's stage whisper to her lord: "I do believe that's going to be a match!" and when he said loudly, "Who?" she said "Ssh! Dr. Travis and that college girl." Dorothea loved him for the way he said "Huh!"

"The idea!" she murmured; "the idea!" and grew so cross about it that she lingered behind the rest, as Youssouf, with a queer, impassive smile, led them up from the shore by a narrow, thorny seam to the route above. So it was perfectly natural that as they wound on down the Eastern Valley she should keep in the rear, in company of St. Stephen and the Angel.

She listened with sympathetic, wide brown eyes, to the whole threadbare history of the little mission out in the Northwest, and when she said at last, "However did you stand it?" the Angel, with her remnants of pretty, faded youth, looked at her quietly:

"Why, you see, we stood it together." And Dorothea said, "Oh!" and did see. It was merely a matter of loving much! And her eyes strayed to the stoop-shouldered, still young man on the donkey's back. She turned suddenly to his wife again:

"I think you could even be martyrs together, couldn't you?"

But the little woman shook her head. "I don't know—Stephen could, but then he is so very true!"

And Dorothea murmured, "I know he'd stand the stones without a word, and look all the while like a stained glass window!" And she rode, for the next half-hour, with a softened look on her piquant face.

Suddenly she touched her donkey. "We had better be getting on," she said: "I think it's growing late." And then, with a little exclamation of surprise, she rose upright in her saddle: "Why, where are the others?"

Ahead of them the road stretched bleak and solitary, altogether bare of moving things. The short, sharp dusk of the East was falling quickly, like a curtain. The little wife called to her husband. "Stephen, dear, we seem to be very far behind; we can't see the way the rest have gone!" And he trotted up to them, shading his eyes with his hand.

"They must have taken some short cut," decided Dorothea. "But I think they might have waited, or—or signaled."

"Perhaps," said the clergyman, "the doctor will ride back for us." But Dorothea tossed her head.

"Dr. Travis has been most inconsiderate!"

Stephen turned his glowing eyes upon her. "You do not know how kind he is," he said gently, and she felt how right was the rebuke.

"At any rate," she said sharply, "we will have to hurry. I'm not afraid, but it's silly getting lost in a place like this! We should have to go—without any supper!" and her eyes filled for no reason in the world.

They rapped their donkeys sharply, but it is one thing to ride a Jerusalem donkey, and another to make him go, and after a half-hour Dorothea turned in despair. "See how dusk it is getting!" she said, "and we are coming to a turn in the road. Haven't you any sort of map, Mr. Duane?" But he shook his head with a troubled expression in his eyes.

"Alas, no; and I thought I knew it all so well! I have dreamed of it all so many times—of the desert, and the olive-slopes, and the gardens!"

Looking at him the girl realized how much of a visionist he was, how utterly impractical at the moment. To him it was not a strange and alien country, but just "Holy Land."

She stood surveying the parting of the ways. "We will turn in here," she said desperately. "Youssouf spoke of a short cut that led out to the lower Jordan—it must be this." And they followed her without question. Suddenly she uttered a little cry of pleased surprise, and leaned from her saddle to detach a fluttering paper from a thorn-bush.

"See—Youssouf has left directions; they have come this way after all!" and they read the straggling English words, pricked with a pin:

"TURN—FOLLOW."

"How curious!" she said. "Why didn't some of them write it for him?"

d then she smiled. But the road, which an as a well-marked camel-track, led twenty minutes later in a zig- trail across a bare and stony slope. ead of them they could outline the k violet of the frowning Moab s; somewhere below them flowed the er—but where? The clergyman was ing to see the face of his watch.

"It is after six," he said, coughing lowly; "we ought surely to come on them soon;" and Dorothea, for first time, saw him look anxious. She faced the desert spaces, trying make out the familiar pack-train. n't that—dust off there?" she asked denly; and they stood waiting as a wny, luminous cloud took shape out the distance.

"It is the last flicker of sunset," said ephen, but Dorothea shook her head. is—men on camels, riding!" and denly she felt afraid.

"Bedouins!" murmured Stephen. hey will direct us. Youssouf has rely pitched the tents by this time." t Dorothea only waited, stiff in her idle, feeling very small and very ch alone.

"They are hurrying," said the min- er's wife. "Oh, I hope they will not ss us by!" and Dorothea frowned a tle.

"I rather wish they would," she said, d looked about at the desolation of e land that was growing indigo in adow. The trail had ended ab- ptly; sand and stubble, and occa- nal thorn-trees, with the queer, unded stones of Syria, almost like bbles, under foot. The donkeys were ibbornly weary.

"How they are hurrying!" repeated e minister's wife. "And suppose they nnot speak English!" But Dorothea owned again.

"Everybody speaks English," she serted stoutly, "if it is only to ask r money! I hope they will not ask for ours." And she tried to laugh as e mounted men drew nearer. She uld already make out the black and own stripes in the abbai of the ader; a moment later he had ouched his camel and alighted, mak- g straight for them where they ood, followed by four black-browed edouins. The next instant they had ithered around the three on their nkeys, with swift, unreadable ges- res, and many remarks in Arabic, in hich "Allah! bismillah!" was re- ated over and over.

"We want to know the way," began orothea boldly; "that is—we have st it." She grew a shade paler un- r the Arab's cool stare, and turned elplessly to Stephen. "Ask him," she urmured, and Stephen lifted his lm, somber eyes.

"Have you seen," he began, "a party tourists, English people, going over ese hills with Youssouf, a dragoman Jerusalem?" But the man in the rown abbai promptly turned his back nd gave an order in Arabic. In- antlytwoof the Bedouins approached ie women, with palms outstretched, ot after the manner of beggars, but s those who demand.

Dorothea cast a nervous glance at tephen. "I am sure they can speak nglish," she said. "Tell them—tell nem," she went on excitedly, "that we ave nothing of value about us." On he impulse she drew out her tiny ilver-mesh purse and threw it at the eader's feet. "There is a dollar and eventy cents," she said, laughing a rifle hysterically. But Stephen inter- osed—

"Miss Dorothea, they do not come to ob us; this is God's country." And he urned to the leader with a gentle in- istence. "Hand the young lady her urse."

The Arab merely kicked it aside vith his foot, curving his nostrils, and overing Stephen with his flashing yes. "Allah is great," he said sono- ously, in excellent English. "His dogs re used to choice morsels—we will de- part with the Chicago lady's dia- monds."

Dorothea, staring, speechless, saw Stephen shake his head. "I do not un- derstand you," he said; "my wife never had a diamond in her life, and the young lady has none—thank God, if it will save you from so great a sin!" But the Arab only showed his teeth, and with a rapid gesture tore the coat from Stephen's shoulders, holding it aloft, and shaking it where he stood.

"There is nothing," persisted Ste- phen, "and I trust you will not leave me without covering." He coughed as he spoke, but the Arab, suddenly fierce, shouted in Arabic and caught up the small sandalwood box where it had fallen to the ground. The next moment Mrs. Blair's lorgnon with its diamond chain dangled from his long brown fingers. "Ha—he did not lie!"

Stephen, in shocked surprise, had turned to the women. "What does it mean?" he stammered. "Which of you did it?" And Dorothea made a piteous motion with her lips.

"They are Mrs. Blair's," she gasped; "it was a joke—Youssouf's joke. But —how could they know?"

Stephen shook his head.

"We thought they would be safe with you," the girl went on, with dry lips. He drew a deep breath: "It was a trust, then?" She nodded.

He turned instantly to his wife. "Take off your rings, dearest, the pearl, and—the other."

"You gave me the pearl yourself, Stephen, when—when we were en- gaged—and my wedding-ring—how can you ask it?" He had taken her hand, very gently, and was firmly loos- ing them from her fingers. "Now," he said, "my watch."

Dorothea, who understood, detached hers from her belt and gave it to him, with the little locket she wore. He held up his by its well-worn chain, a thick gold cross, the symbol of his call- ing, dangling at the end. Then he held them out to the Arab.

"Before God," he said sternly, "you shall not steal! I give you these freely, but the others are not mine. You must hand them back!" Dorothea was plucking excitedly at his sleeve.

"Some one—" she stammered breathlessly, "some one—is coming!" And stared behind her into the thicket of thorn-trees. "Oh—it is Youssouf!"

"Thank God!" murmured Stephen, and they waited, with parted lips, while Youssouf glided out upon them from the dusk; but Dorothea, as she saw the dragoman's inscrutable eyes upon her, felt that she was turning to stone.

"Youssouf, my good fellow—" be- gan the clergyman. But Youssouf laughed.

"Dog of a Christian prophet—thou shouldst have worn a padlock on thy coat-tail!"

"This shall be told to the consul at Jerusalem," said Stephen bravely. But Youssouf denied.

"Neither at Jerusalem nor at Chi- cago shall the truth be known," he snarled. "The dragoman business fits one for many trades. Thou shalt yet say Allah is great!"

"God is great," said Stephen, and lifted his eyes to the Syrian sky where the little stars were coming out.

"The others will find us!" cried Dorothea; "you dare not do us harm!" But Youssouf laughed.

"They search by other roads. The Chicago lady and the fat Aunt have the hysterics in the little tent by the river. The Doctor's donkey is in league with Mohammed, and rides slow! The donkey-boys are—donkey- boys!" With a rapid movement he caught the chain of Mrs. Blair's lorg- non. "Now," he said, "bind them, my brothers! But gag them not—it is a wide place for women to scream in!"

But at the word Dorothea choked. "Oh," she cried, "coward, thief, traitor! How dare you betray us?

IN HOLY LAND

It was you—it was you who did it all!"

The dragoman, straightening his bent neck, stood erect and insolent before her, the hatred of centuries staring at her from the mask of his Mohammedan features. "Even I," he muttered, "I, the poor dragoman who has carted Christian chattels and led Christian donkeys all the years of my life! Now, Allah be praised, I shall be paid in full!"

At his gesture the Arab in the brown abbai tore withes from a reed-like growth in the sand, and forcing Stephen from his donkey, bound his wrists tightly, tossing the ribbony lengths to the others, to fetter the women, while Youssouf, with narrowed eyes, watched to see it done.

"Now," cried the dragoman, standing over Stephen, "kneel—the stones shall be thy prayer-rug!" And he forced him to the ground. But at the sight, the little wife, staggering across the distance between them, threw herself beside him.

"Stephen—Stephen dear, they will kill you!"

He turned his eyes upon her sadly. "My dear, you forget—God is here. It is Holy Land!" And then Youssouf tore her roughly away.

"Say it," he cried, "thou flat-chested Christian: 'There is one God, Allah, and Mohammed is his prophet!'" But Stephen lifted his eyes to the hills.

"There are many prophets," he uttered, "and but one God, the Lord whom I serve."

"Thou shalt serve him, then, but three winks longer," snarled Youssouf, catching up one of the little round stones, while the Arab in brown loosened, with a slow gesture full of meaning, a long dirk from his belt. The little wife, uttering a broken word, held out her bound hands and fainted, and Dorothea, sobbing, covered her face.

"There is one God—Allah," howled Youssouf, "and Mohammed is his prophet!" And Stephen, smiling, repeated in a voice that gathered the strength of final victory:

"There is one God—who is love!"

The stone, in an instant, struck the bound wrists with a cruel sound; another, circling, fell a hair's-breadth short of his temple, and then the Arab drew his knife.

But quick as a flash Youssouf had it in his long brown hand.

"Why should we trouble!" he exclaimed. "The holy man's cough is of the graveyard—it shall do the business for us, since we have the little box from his coat-tail!" And when the others, black-browed, showed a murmured dissent, he spoke to them rapidly in Arabic, and sullenly they drew away, mounting silently the gray, crouching camels.

Youssouf, tumbling Mrs. Blair's jewels into the sandalwood box, saw the minister's watch lying with Dorothea's and the little rings, in the sand, and gathered them up, gloating.

"Thou shalt keep thy coat," he cried, "since its tail has wagged welcome!" Then, mounting behind the Arab in the brown abbai, he waved his hand.

For a moment, terror-stricken, Dorothea gazed after them, till she heard the clergyman ask faintly, "Have you a knife?" Then she crawled to him across the stony ground.

"No," she sobbed, "and you are in pain!"

Stephen sighed. "I cannot lift my wrists," he said. "I think they may be broken. But could you, in some way—"

She hesitated an instant; then she lifted her own bound hands and set her little teeth into the strong withes. When she had at last freed them she fell back a moment, exhausted, but she began almost instantly to pluck at the stiff knots of Stephen's bonds.

"I am afraid," she gasped, "I—hurt you!" But he only said, "No matter," and waited with tight-drawn lips till she had finished. "And now, Miriam," he said—and she caught the pity in his voice.

"She is all right," she tried to call cheerfully as she bent above the prostrate figure, "she is opening her eyes!" And then she went on fumbling with the poor, thin wrists. "St. Stephen—" murmured the little woman. They were her first words of consciousness.

"Yes, yes," murmured Dorothea, as she would have to a child, "but he did not die, you know." And she thanked God in her heart that it was true! Ten minutes later they had found a little cluster of juniper trees and were resting against their slim trunks, waiting for the dawn.

Stephen coughed painfully at intervals, and his face was pallid in the starlight, but his wife's head was pillowed on his knees, and her ringless fingers were prisoned in his, and Dorothea, knowing it, felt that they were in a world of their own, from which she must be forever shut out, and there was a great emptiness in her heart. Was love, then, so much?

As if Stephen had grasped her thought he went on, in little, broken sentences: "How poor a thing is hatred! They will see that—those Arabs—and be sorry. Love is all that matters—in God's wide world!" And Dorothea felt her eyes fill with quick, warm tears.

"What hurts me," went on Stephen, musing into the darkness, "is that such a thing could have happened—here, where Christ walked!"

"But it was all so long, long ago," breathed Dorothea. She could not see Stephen's face plainly, but she fancied, as he turned it upon her, that he was smiling.

"Nothing is ever lost that is good," he said. "It is Holy Land still!" But he saw with the eyes of the visionist what she could not.

At midnight Dorothea started up, terrified.

"Oh," she gasped, "Mr. Duane! there is something—!"

The next instant a figure had burst upon them where they had waited, a figure in a white kaftan, ghostly in the starlight!

"Ho!" called Youssouf's voice; and the little wife cried out, and hid her face against Stephen's knees, while Dorothea cowered against her tree-trunk.

"I heard thy squeaking cough," called Youssouf. "It was as good as a lane of lanterns!" and something struck the sand at Stephen's feet. "I had to steal them a second time," cried Youssouf—he was breathing quickly, as if he had been running—"while my brothers slept in the hills, but the two sins may be accounted to me for righteousness—who knows?" And then he came close to Stephen and crouched above him in the dark.

"I have brought them back," he whispered, "to stick again in thy silly coat-tail—all but the little cross!" and with a low-breathed sigh he stumbled backward.

"Youssouf! Youssouf! thank God in your soul!" Stephen had risen to his knees. His face was as the face of an angel.

"I did it not to save my soul," called back Youssouf, "but for another matter!" and as he vanished behind the juniper-thicket he paused again and hurled back final sentence. "I did it, dog of a Christian prophet, because my mother was—a Christian!" And his words came like a sob through the darkness!

Stephen leaned back, closing his eyes, as the footsteps died into silence. "I told you," he said faintly, "it was Holy Land."

Pallid gray and splendor of rose, death and life, sleep and waking! The shouts of the donkey-boys roused Dorothea, and she rose on one elbow, staring out upon a golden Syrian sunrise!

The next instant she was on her

The "Titanic's" Last Music

AUTUMN — FRANCOIS H. BARTHELEMON

ROM many of the survivors of the Titanic disaster, it has been learned t almost at the last moment, when great vessel was about to sink be- ath the waves, the band on deck was ying the beautiful sacred song, utumn." Harold Bride, the wire- s operator, who narrowly escaped ng down with the steamer, told er his rescue that the strains of utumn" came to him as he was be- picked up by one of the lifeboats. her survivors, who were probably eatly agitated and confused at the ne, believed they had heard "Nearer, God, to Thee," but while that beau- ul hymn may also have been played ward the close in that fatal night, ere now seems to be little doubt that utumn" was the tune last heard.

It is a beautiful hymn and we pub- h the words and music of it on this ge. The words are these:

God of mercy and compassion!
Look with pity on my pain;
Hear a mournful, broken spirit
Prostrate at thy feet complain;
Many are my foes, and mighty;
Strength to conquer I have none;
Nothing can uphold my goings,
But thy blessed self alone.

Saviour, look on thy beloved,
Triumph over all my foes;
Turn to heavenly joy my mourning,
Turn to gladness all my woes;
Live or die, or work or suffer,
Let my weary soul abide,
In all changes whatsoever,
Sure and steadfast by thy side.

When temptations fierce assault me,
When my enemies I find,
Sin and guilt, and death and Satan,
All against my soul combined,
Hold me up in mighty waters,
Keep my eyes on things above,
Righteousness, divine atonement,
Peace, and everlasting love.

Surely nothing could have been more appropriate than this hymn, which is in itself a prayer to the great Father of us all.

Not one of the musicians of the Titanic was saved. Bandsmen on other big steamers who knew them well have given some touching reminiscences concerning them. One of the players, John Hume, was to have been married after the return trip. He was a man of rare talent, and was formerly bandmaster on the Carmania. He was popularly known as "Happy Jack Hume." He came of a race of musicians and musical instrument makers. Another of the band was Frederick Clark, bass viol, who had achieved some reputation for chamber music and who was on his first voyage when he lost his life. The bandmaster was a man named Hartley, a violinist, a splendid performer and a successful composer. He was a great believer in the power of music to prevent panic. Other members were Herbert Taylor, pianist, a fine performer; George Woodward, 'cellist, and a trio named Brailey, Krins and Breicoux, who together gave many delightful performances. This little musical company formed really two bands—a saloon orchestra of five men, and a deck band of three. England, Scotland, Germany and France were represented in their nationalities. They were probably all massed together under Hartley, playing that last hymn:

Hold me up in mighty waters,
Keep my eye on things above,

as the great Titanic took her final plunge.

et, supported by Dr. Travis' strong m, while the donkey-boys, Moham- ed Ali and Abdullah, roused Stephen id his wife, who still slept.

"Child, child," muttered the Doc- r, and growled fiercely into his mous- che, "what a risk you have run—in l this damp!"

And Dorothea smiled a trifle tear- lly as she murmured, "Yes, haven't e been—careless?" and was happy at he looked so grave.

"I shall never let you out of my ght again!" he asserted, and she id, "Oh, please don't!" which was yptic, and might have meant any- ing.

"Stephen, old man," said the Doctor, re you all right?" And Stephen id, "All right, Dick, but one of my rists needs mending." And Dorothea ved the pity in the Doctor's eyes as, ith quick, deft touches, he bound the m of his friend.

"Well," he growled, "have you had ough of this Syria?" and Stephen smiled. "Enough," he said, "Dick, to dream about forever! It's Holy Land still!" and then began to worry about the notes that dropped from his pocket.

While they rode slowly back to camp, where Bathsheba and Mrs. Weldon were in charge of Bathsheba's lord, he walked beside Dorothea's donkey, and insisted on holding her in the saddle.

"I shall leave for Jaffa on Thursday," he said, as they came out on the high road, and her head dropped.

"Oh!"

"And I shall take you with me!" he added, savagely. He was wooing her like a Bedouin, fiercely gentle, after the manner of the land.

Her eyelids quivered a little.

"Will you go with me, child?" he whispered, and she somehow stammered, "Yes!"

"Little desert-blossom," he said a moment later, "I think St. Stephen is right, you know. It's Holy Land to me, too!"

FROM childhood to old age, health, beauty and success are dependent, in a large measure, on sound teeth. Sound teeth mean clean teeth, and clean teeth, for the past fifty years, have meant for millions of people the daily use of

PERFECT
Tooth Powder

Prepared for almost half a century by a Doctor of Dental Surgery

Perfect health is not possible with unsound teeth, and success is not probable without good health. Increased efficiency, due to your ability to properly masticate your food, and a sweet clean breath will follow the use of Dr. Lyon's. Sound, clean teeth are an asset that will surely advance your interests in social as well as business affairs.

A woman's beauty is made or marred by her teeth. A plain face is made attractive by pretty teeth, while good features are often ruined by ill-kept teeth. Dr. Lyon's is a dainty dentifrice that particular women can use with pleasure. Children should be taught to use the brush and Dr. Lyon's Tooth Powder, especially while their mouths contain both temporary and permanent teeth. At this time decay is most apt to occur, due to the bad condition of the temporary teeth that are being replaced.

If your teeth are free from decay, the use of Dr. Lyon's Powder after each meal will keep them that way. If it were possible to keep teeth perfectly clean, there would be no such thing as decay. Dr. Lyon's being in powder form, produces most closely the ideal condition of perfect cleanliness.

Questions and Answers

E. S., Deming, N. M. How can any one purify or filter water in order to make it free from injurious minerals?

A simple filter consists of a cup or tube, with perforated bottom, about half filled with small pieces of charcoal, through which the water is made to flow. Instead of charcoal, coarse sand or gravel may be used, but these are not as good purifiers. Pipestone is occasionally used, but has the disadvantage of being very slow. When water holds minerals, such as iron, then lime and other chemicals are used to precipitate this inorganic matter, and then the ordinary filter is used to free it from the precipitate.

H. H., Bridgeport, Conn. In the story of the Titanic disaster, I do not see any account of the use of the searchlight or of the binocular glass. Was she equipped with these devices? It has been stated that the lights of a steamer some five miles distant were seen after the disaster, yet on a starry and calm night they did not discover the proximity of the berg till within a quarter of a mile of it.

The Titanic had no searchlight, but doubtless was furnished with binocular glasses. The man on the lookout (crow's nest) testified he had no night glass. Certainly, the lights of a steamer could be seen five miles distant, but an iceberg is different, being more or less clouded with the haze of the sea and assuming much the same color as the sea at night, so that it is impossible to descry it afar.

H. C. A., Zena, Ill. Please explain the Jewish doctrine.

The Jews accept the Old Testament as the Word of God, and reject the New. They do not believe that Jesus was the Messiah, nor that he was the Son of God. They accept the commandments, history and prophecies of the Old Testament, though, because of their exile from Palestine, they no longer offer the sacrifices prescribed by the Mosaic law.

J. E. D., Hempstead, L. I. 1. "In your MAIL-BAG the question is asked when the Presbyterian Church was founded. You say the oldest Presbyterian Church in America was in Jamaica, L. I., built about 1662. Christ's First Presbyterian Church in Hempstead, L. I., was organized by Rev. Richard Denton and followers in 1644. The Jamaica church is an offshoot of the Hempstead church. In 1630 the Rev. Richard Denton and followers left Halifax, England, and landed the same year at Plymouth, Mass. From there they went to Watertown and for several years they were there, but the relations with the Puritans not being pleasant, they left and started a settlement at Witherfield, Conn. From there they went to Stamford, and in 1644 they crossed the Sound and permanently located at Hempstead, where their church has had a continual existence to the present time, except during the Revolutionary War, when the British troops had possession of the property."

J. B. J., Richmond, Va. 1. When and where were marriage licenses first issued, or legalized, in the Scriptures? 2. How long is it since marriages were first solemnized by public ceremonies, and what was the mode of marriage prior to this?

1. Betrothal, which among the ancient Hebrews was accomplished by a letter or contract, was the beginning of the marriage license. The marriage price, which implies this right or license to marry, is referred to in Gen. 31: 15; 34: 12, in Ex. 22: 17; in Ruth 4: 10 and in other Old Testament passages. 2. The Mosaic law prescribed no civil or religious forms for the celebration of marriage. The contract made at the payment of the marriage price perfected the solemn bond which united the espoused parties. There was generally a feast which lasted seven days, during which the bride and groom took a prominent part. In ancient Egypt, there were no civil or religious ceremonies, but much public clamor over the announcement of a betrothal. There are no records of marriage contracts, dowries, or ceremonies among the older nations, although it is to be presumed that they were recognized to a certain extent, at least, in Arabia, Babylonia, Assyria, etc.

Mrs. I. A., Imlay City, Mich. Kindly explain I. Pet. 3: 3 and I. Tim. 2: 9. Some denominations, I believe, hold that the wearing of any gold, even to a wedding ring, is not permissible, and the people of these churches also dress, as a rule, in a uniformly plain fashion. Why do other churches not practice the same simplicity?

The phraseology of these passages makes it quite impossible to consider them as positive commands. For instance, braiding the hair and wearing gold are put side by side in both of them; and not even the strictest advocates of simplicity in adornment would hold to-day that it is wrong for a woman or a girl to braid her hair. There is no possible doubt, however, that the Christian Church has wandered altogether too far from the New Testament teaching of simplicity. In this, as in many other matters, the deepening and straightening of the inner life will settle questions of habit and conduct. A woman who loves God with all her heart, who is doing all she can and giving all she can to feed and comfort and save those who are in need and in sin, will find herself putting away many things she had formerly looked upon as right, and even needful. Sometimes special circumstances make costly garments almost a necessity. A consecrated army officer, for example, needs to wear his prescribed uniform; just so it is sometimes expedient for wealthy people to dress as their friends do and as others expect them to. But thousands of churches and tens of thousands of Christians, in the face of the world's great need, might well heed these apostolic exhortations to return to a more modest and more holy habit of clothing and adornment.

Mrs. J. O. B., Walter, Okla. In several places through the Bible I read that for some sins a person "shall be cut off from his people." What does this expression mean? Does it refer to this world, or the next, or both?

This expression, occurring frequently in Exodus and Leviticus, is equivalent to the later act of "excommunication." The tribal tie was strong in these early days, and to the Jews it was especially strong because it represented not only the union of the people to one another, but their union with Jehovah. To be "cut off from his people" meant that the offender was expelled from the Israelitish nation. In some cases it probably meant being put to death. But while the expression implied separation from God, it is hardly likely, in these early days, when the ideas of a future life were extremely vague, that the words carried with them the idea of being punished after death.

D. A. B., Tessier, Saskatchewan. Is there no dry dock on the American seaboard large enough to accommodate such a vessel as the Titanic?

No; the only dry dock large enough is that on the river Lagan, Belfast, the largest in the world. It is 886 feet long and contains 23,000,000 gallons of water when filled.

E. V. E., Marshfield, Ore. What does the Roman Catholic Bible contain that the Protestant does not, and what is their authority for including it and ours for omitting it?

The Roman Catholic Bible differs from the Protestant in that it contains books which are not found in the Hebrew Old Testament, which is regarded as being the original. The additions found in the Roman Catholic Bible were translated from the Greek into the Latin, and from the latter into English and German, and thus passed into the older editions of the Bible. These books are known as "Apocrypha," and form a connecting link between the Old and the New Testament periods. In doctrinal matters, Protestants only acknowledge the books which formed the canon in the time of Christ, namely: Moses and the prophets, the Psalms and historical books. On this account, the present editions of the Bible contain only what are called the "canonical writings," omitting those that are uncanonical or repudiated as unauthoritative and of doubtful inspiration and value. The New Testament part of the Roman Catholic Bible contains the same books which are given in the Protestant Bible. The Romanist belief in purgatory has no support whatsoever in the canonical or uncanonical books, but is the outcome of a strained and distorted interpretation of such passages as Matt. 5: 25 and 12: 32; I. Cor. 3: 11-15; 15: 29; Rev. 21: 27, etc. Similarly, the doctrine of papal priority and authority is based upon a solitary text (Matt. 16: 18), which has been wrenched from its original setting and purpose to suit this end.

J. W. S., Wichita, Kan. I heard a minister say recently, in preaching, that there is a place in the Christian's experience in which the devil will no longer try to seduce him by temptation, but will attack by other modes of hindrance; that if the Christian fails to attain to that degree in the divine life there is something wrong in his sincerity, earnestness or faith. He explained that the temptation of Jesus in the wilderness proved to the devil that it was absolutely useless to follow up the effort to tempt our Saviour and that he never assailed him again. Are these views correct? Should Heb. 2: 18 and 4: 15 lead us to believe that Christ was subject to temptations to commit outward sins? If there is this difference between trials and temptations how may we distinguish one from the other?

The minister's statement about a spiritual condition in which the Christian is not "tempted" is opposed both to Scripture and experience. Teachers and writers even of the extreme wing of the "holiness movement" do not hold that the Christian is free from temptation in this life. There cannot be any fault in being tempted; the fault lies in one's attitude toward the temptation. The statements in Hebrews to which you refer seem to indicate clearly that Christ suffered all the forms of temptation to which mankind is normally liable. It is this very fact that gives him his tremendous hold upon men; they feel that he can take them safely through the experiences through which he himself went unpolluted. The clearest distinction between temptations and trials is made in James 1. Although the same word is used for both, it is evident that it has these two distinct meanings; verse 2 refers to trials, verses 13, 14 and 15, to temptations to sin. Temptations to sin can never come from God; this is the key to distinguishing them from trials, which he himself sometimes sends. The teaching of the New Testament is that the Christian may have his heart filled with love. Here is complete safety. The instant a suggestion comes to do a thing which would harm some one or displease Christ, our love repels the suggestion and we do the kind and holy thing. There need be no response of heart or will to the evil suggestion; but we cannot hope to be free from the suggestions themselves till we reach heaven. To repeat: the suggestions themselves are not sinful, but the immediate attitude we take toward them is sinful or righteous according as we accept or reject them.

Mrs. B. B., Millington, N. J. 1. Who was St. Bartholomew? 2. What was the massacre of St. Bartholomew?

1. St. Bartholomew was one of the twelve apostles of Jesus. He is constantly named with Philip in the Gospels of Matthew, Mark and Luke, and is believed to be the same person as Nathanael, who is mentioned in association with Philip in the Gospel of John. Bartholomew means simply son of Tolmai, or Talmai. Nathanael is thus supposed to be his real name, Bartholomew merely stating his relationship. 2. The massacre of St. Bartholomew began in Paris on St. Bartholomew's Day, the day set apart to commemorate the apostle, in 1572. It was an attack upon the Huguenots, or French Protestants, whose leaders had been invited to Paris to celebrate the marriage of Henry of Navarre with Marguerite, sister of the king of France, Charles IX., and daughter of Catherine de Medici. It was Catherine who was the actual perpetrator of this ghastly butchery. She persuaded Charles not to interfere, leading him to believe that the Huguenots were plotting against the throne. The massacre spread throughout France, and the number of the slain has been variously estimated from 30,000 to 100,000.

E. E. H., Sargeant, Minn. Is the story of Robinson Crusoe true? If so, on what island did he land?

Robinson Crusoe was written by Daniel Defoe in 1719. While it is really a work of fiction, it is based on the experiences of Alexander Selkirk, who was sailing master on the Cinque Ports, a vessel which sailed from England on a buccaneering expedition in 1703. Selkirk quarreled with the captain and was, at his own request, put ashore on the island of Juan Fernandez, where he lived in solitude for four years and four months, till rescued by a ship under the command of Captain Wood Rodgers. Defoe changed many of the details of Selkirk's experience in his novel, and some critics go so far as to doubt whether he really made it the basis of his work. The island mentioned in Robinson Crusoe is located at the mouth of the Orinoco.

Due to mistaken information which came to one of the most reliable firms of commercial photographers in New York City from one of their correspondents in Illinois, a picture supplied by that firm for publication in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD appeared in the issue of April 24 bearing the title "A typical scene at Mound City, Ill.; ground floors all flooded." It has been brought to our attention that at no time during the recent flood was Mound City severely affected, as the efforts of its business men and citizens in general were successful in keeping its levees intact. Although not directly responsible for this error the editor wishes to correct any misapprehension which may have resulted from it.

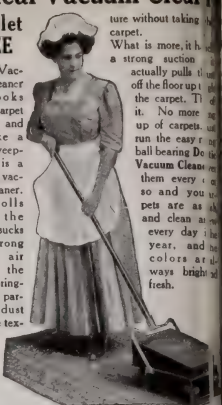
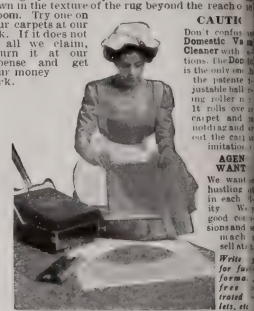
A Real Vacuum Cleaner

Booklet FREE

Here is a Vacuum Cleaner that looks like a carpet sweeper and runs like a carpet sweeper, yet is a powerful vacuum cleaner. As it rolls across the room it sucks up a strong blast of air through the carpet, bringing every particle of dust out of the texture without taking up the carpet. What is more, it has a strong suction that actually pulls the dirt off the floor up into the carpet. There is no more up of carpets. You run the easy ball bearing Domestic Vacuum Cleaner over them every day or so and your carpets are as clean and clean as every day in the year, and the colors are always bright and fresh.



The pile of dirt shown here was removed from a Domestic Vacuum Cleaner after the rug had been thoroughly cleaned by old methods. This dirt is down in the texture of the rug beyond the reach of a broom. Try one on your carpets at our risk. If it does not do all we claim, return it at our expense and get your money back.



CAUTION. Don't confuse the Domestic Vacuum Cleaner with some imitations. The Domestic is the only one having the patented instable handle and swing roller motion. It rolls over the carpet and sets the nap straight and throws out the dust in a manner imitations cannot.

AGENTS WANTED. We want a hustling agent in each locality. We will give good exclusive territory and a liberal commission and sell at first sight. Write for full information, free sample, illustrated booklets, etc.

f You Like a Little Quiet Fun

sk ome pompous person if Grape-Nuts Food helps build the brain.

Chances are you get a withering sneer and a hiss of denunciation.

Then sweetly play with the learned toad.

Ask him to tell you the analysis of brain material and the analysis of Grape-Nuts.

"Don't know? Why, I supposed you based your opinions on exact knowledge instead of sthg out a conclusion like you would a sneeze."

"Well, now your tire is punctured, let's sit down like good friends and repair it."

The bulky materials of brain are water and albumin, but these things cannot blend without lite worker known as Phosphate of Potash, defined as a "mineral salt."

One authority, Geohegan, shows in his analysis of brain, 5.33 per cent. total of mineral lts over one-half being Phosphoric Acid and Potash combined (Phosphate of Potash) 9 per cent.

Beaunis, another authority, shows Phosphoric Acid and Potash (Phosphate of Potash) or than one-half the total mineral salts, being 73.44 per cent. in a total of 101.07.

Analysis of Grape-Nuts shows Potassium and Phosphorus (which join and ta e Phosphate of Potash) is considerable more than one-half of all the mineral lt in the food.

Dr. Geo. W. Carey, an authority on the constituent elements of the body, says: "The at matter of the brain is controlled entirely by the inorganic cell-salt, Potassium Phosphate Phosphate of Potash). This salt unites with albumin and by the addition of oxygen creates br fluid or the gray matter of the brain. Of course, there is a trace of other salts and other gnic matter in nerve fluid, but Potassium Phosphate is the chief factor, and has the power ith in itself to attract, by its own law of affinity, all things needed to manufacture the elixir of life."

Further on he says: "The beginning and end of the matter is to supply the lacking riple, and in molecular form, exactly as nature furnishes it in vegetables, fruits and grain. To ply deficiencies—this is the only law of cure."

Brain is made of Phosphate of Potash as the principal Mineral Salt, ded to albumin and water.

Grape-Nuts contains that element as more than one-half of all its neral salts.

Every day's use of brain wears away a little.

Suppose your kind of food does not contain Phosphate of Potash.

How are you going to rebuild today the worn-out parts of yesterday?

And if you don't, why shouldn't nervous prostration and brain-fag result.

Remember, Mind does not work well on a brain that is even partly broken down from ac of nourishment.

It is true that other food besides Grape-Nuts contains varying quantities of Brain food.

Plain wheat and barley do. But in Grape-Nuts there is a certainty.

And if the elements demanded by Nature, are eaten, the life forces have the needed material to build from.

A healthy brain is important, if one would "do things" in this world.

A man who sneers at "Mind" sneers at the best and least understood part of himself. That part which some folks believe links us to h Infinite.

Mind asks for a healthy brain upon which to act, and Nature has defined a way to make a healthy brain and renew it day by day as it ed up from work of the previous day.

Nature's way to rebuild is by the use of food which supplies the things required.

FROM THE EDITOR

He Forgot That He Had a Stomach

Talking of food, there is probably no professional man subjected to a greater, more wearing mental strain than the responsible editor of a modern newspaper.

To keep his mental faculties constantly in good working order, the editor must keep his physical powers up to the highest rate of efficiency. Nothing will so quickly upset the whole system as badly selected food and a disordered stomach. It therefore follows that he should have right food, which can be readily assimilated, and which furnishes true brain nourishment.

"My personal experience in the use of Grape-Nuts and Postum," writes a Philadelphia editor, "so exactly agrees with your advertised claim as to their merits that any further exposition in that direction would seem to be superfluous. They have benefited me so much, however, during the five years that I have used them, that I do not feel justified in withholding my testimony.

"General 'high living' with all that the expression implies as to a generous table, brought about indigestion, in my case, with restlessness at night and lassitude in the morning, accompanied by various pains and distressing sensations during working hours.

"The doctor diagnosed the condition as 'catarrh of the stomach,' and prescribed various medicines, which did me no good. I finally 'threw physics to the dogs,' gave up tea and coffee and heavy meat dishes, and adopted Grape-Nuts and Postum as the chief articles of my diet.

"I can conscientiously say, and I wish to say it with all the emphasis possible to the English language, that they have benefited me as medicines never did, and more than any other food that ever came on my table.

"My experience is that the Grape-Nuts food has steadied and strengthened both brain and nerves to a most positive degree. How it does it, I cannot say, but I know that after breakfasting on Grape-Nuts food one actually forgets he has a stomach, let alone 'stomach trouble.' It is, in my opinion, the most beneficial as well as the most economical food on the market, and has absolutely no rival." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

TRUTHFULNESS*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WE HEAR a good deal these days about joining the "Ananias Club," named for the well-known Ananias who lied about the price of the gift he was making to the early church, both he and his wife, and as a punishment they were both stricken with death, "fell down, were carried forth and buried" (Acts 5: 1-10). But whenever we read in the daily papers or hear in conversation about some one who has "joined the Ananias Club," it is always some person of distinction, and it is treated as a joke. This is a much to be regretted indication that the bars of truth have been let down in society at large. It is to be hoped that such a Sunday-school lesson as we have today on Truthfulness will greatly help to correct lying, and establish "the law of truth in the mouth" (Mal. 2: 6).

In the matter of absolute truthfulness, polite society is not blameless. We write in our letters, "With sentiments of the highest esteem," etc., when we really have no such feeling for the person addressed. We write a recommendation, "I cordially recommend the bearer to your favorable consideration," when it is the easiest way to get rid of the person who has applied to us for help. We say, "No, that story is new to me, go ahead and tell it," when mentally we say, "It is a chestnut, but I know it will gratify you to tell it." Sometimes the public speaker, or even the minister of the Gospel, says, "Now, one word in conclusion," and afterward talks a long time, and tires his hearers almost beyond endurance.

The business world, too, is culpable. "You will find our prices the cheapest in the city," when in reality fully as much if not more is charged than in other stores. "Prime California peaches," when the fruit grew in a spot one thousand miles from California, and only the top layer in the basket is prime, while at the bottom the fruit is small, or stale, or wormy. "This goods is warranted all wool," when in reality it is hardly one-third wool. The lawyer says to the judge: "All my client asks in this case is justice," when he is striving to win at any cost. There is a familiar story of Abraham Lincoln. It is worth repeating many times, to show that a lawyer may be true. He was defending a man accused of theft. In the course of the trial, evidence was introduced by the other side showing that his client was attempting a fraud. Mr. Lincoln arose in deep disgust and went to his hotel. The judge sent for him. "Tell the judge," he said, "that my hands are dirty, and I came over to wash them."

Lying in political life is not unheard of! A man desiring an appointment obtained many signatures recommending him to President Cleveland, although, unknown to the President, the man was appointed on the strength of such indorsements. One gentleman, who thought he had been forced to sign the paper, wrote a letter to the President saying that he had never expected that appointment to be made. The President replied: "Your confession comes too late to be of immediate use to the public service, and I can only say that, while this is not the first time I have been misled by lying and treacherous representations, you are the first one who has so frankly owned his grievous fault. If any comfort is to be extracted from this assurance, you are welcome to it." Thus was a liar rebuked.

Parents are guilty of lying to their children sometimes, just to get rid of their bother—to satisfy them for the

GOSPEL WORK IN A PRISON

OVER a year ago, a young man, a prisoner in the penitentiary at Moundsville, W. Va., became a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. So impressed was he with the helpfulness of the paper in his own case that he decided to do what he could to interest his fellow prisoners. He wrote to the Circulation Department of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which gladly extended to him all necessary facilities for conducting such an effort. Fortunately, the Moundsville Penitentiary is one of the best managed institutions of its kind in the country. Its warden and guards are upright men, and the morals of a majority of the prisoners are on a higher plane than in most prisons, due largely to the example set by the warden and his assistants. The prisoner, having the permission of the authorities of the institution, began his canvass and soon secured surprising results. It was astonishing how popular the paper became in that prison. List after list of subscribers was received, a considerable proportion of them being the names of friends and acquaintances of the prisoners in different parts of the State. By the end of September, 1911, he had secured, with the aid of his associates, over 300 subscribers, and what had been begun in a small and insignificant way developed into a great Gospel work, all through the efforts of one man who was moved by the best impulses for the benefit of his fellow men and who enjoyed the hearty co-operation of the staff of prison officers. This is one of the most remarkable cases of the kind, although there are many institutions throughout the country in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has long been a prime factor of spiritual and intellectual improvement. It is literally "sowing beside all waters." The readers of this journal who are interested in the welfare of the Moundsville prisoners will unite with us in praying that it may be made a means of grace to all who read it. To any one who is sufficiently interested and who may desire to assist in this movement, we will be glad to send the name of the young man who has been the originator of so remarkable a work.

A Beloved Historian

THE name of John Clark Ridpath is becoming more and more deeply rooted in the mind and therefore in the history of the American people. The historian himself is coming to be a larger and more noteworthy part of the very history he wrote. For his histories have struck the popular note and appeal to the popular taste. His name is a household word.

Professor Ridpath lived his fine life and did his splendid work in the quiet town of Greencastle, Ind., that land of letters, where he filled for many years the chair of History at DePauw University. The university itself, by the way, recently sprang again into public notice by the addition of $500,000 to its endowment, $100,000 of which was contributed by John D. Rockefeller, the rest raised largely from the Methodist churches of Indiana by vigorous agents of the college. While General Wallace was writing Ben Hur, near Wabash College at Crawfordsville, and Riley at Indianapolis was penning his heart-stirring lyrics and ballads, Dr. Ridpath, in the hours between class work, wrote his great History of the World. Dr. Ridpath will be remembered as the real teacher, who has made, and still is making, the study of history a delight.

Striking Effects of Different Foods

NOTE. The New Brainy Diet System was originated by S. Lepnel, the London Dietitian, and is a science based on Dr. Bellows' standard work "The Philosophy o. Eating."

YOU probably know something of the effects of different foods. For instance, an excess of starchy (paste making) foods produces sluggishness, dull, splitting headaches, lack of memory and concentration, drowsiness and inertia. A change to digestible brainy foods, such as suitable meats, dairy produce, fish and game will produce a marked improvement. An excess of viscid foods, such as eggs, cream, butter, cheese, etc., causes catarrh, which frequently results in deafness and other complaints. Irritating or foreign elements, such as table salt, soda water, and some other drug-store beverages, and certain elements of foods, cause kidney and bladder troubles. Some foods specially affect the liver or the heart or the lungs and skin, according to the nature of the food. Accumulated waste, deposits of foreign elements and poisons from wrong combinations of foods cause diseases; right foods cure. Diseases supposed to be incurable and to bear no relation to foods and some diseases uselessly treated by surgery have yielded to the new dietary treatment.

I CAN TEACH YOU TO CURE YOURSELF

One group of foods, such as lean tender fresh meat, game, poultry, fish, curdled custard, curd cheese, apples, lemons, tomatoes, cucumbers, rice, bread, etc., when rightly combined and proportioned, generates great vitality and magnetism. Another group, including game, poultry, whites of eggs, almonds, pears, asparagus, spinach, celery, etc., is productive of superior intelligence and psychic development. Another group is chiefly productive of strong nerves, moral strength, presence of mind, strong eyes, an even temper and the strong will power which underlies success.

Undesirable foods, such as pork pies, bacon, rich and spiced dishes, grocers' cheese, alcohol, coffee, etc., make one irritable, violent tempered and even immoral; and still others, such as tea and wrong quantities of fatty, starchy and sweet foods, make one nervous, shy and low spirited and lead to premature old age.

Whites of eggs are the elixir of life for the toothless and aged.

Dried peaches and dried apricots are suited to society ladies who wish to be attractive.

Juicy fresh fruit is far more suitable than stewed fruit for business people who interview their clients and wish to be persuasive.

Brilliancy as a speaker or writer is secured by eating green grapes, provided that strong brainy meals have previously been taken.

Knowing something about these effects, would you not like to know all about the influence of foods in your own case and for your own ambitions? No subject is more important—none strikes home more closely to your own welfare, and the welfare of your family.

No technical terms, such as "proteids," "carbo-hydrates," etc., are used. No foods for sale. No fasting, exercising nor drugs are required. FULL NOURISHMENT IS ESSENTIAL.

To Increase or to Reduce Weight

Thin people after strengthening their nerves and digestive power by suitable brainy foods increase their weight by the proper use of cereal foods. Similarly in combination with a simple exercise women can develop the bust.

One chronic sufferer, weighing 415 pounds, unable to exercise, took correct combinations of ordinary daily foods and reduced over 150 pounds, gaining strength with firmness of flesh and losing rheumatism.

Eczema, other skin troubles, and all blood diseases yield to suitable diet.

A May-Pole Luncheon

NOTHING is prettier or daintier than a May-pole luncheon on the veranda or in any bright sunny room of the house. Trim the table charmingly with pear or cherry or apple blossoms; let the centerpiece be a small May-pole from which strings of smilax and bright ribbons hang. Twenty-six inches of ordinary curtain rod stuck through a box two inches deep will stand securely. Wrap the pole with green and white ribbon or crinkled tissue paper. Fasten lightly as many ribbon and smilax streamers to the top of the pole as there are guests and let each streamer end in a bow tied to a bunch of wild flowers, making a large wreath around the foot of the May-pole. A lead pencil and a small card should be placed at each plate, and during the luncheon each girl must make a sketch of a flower. Some of the drawings are sure to be funny and will provoke plenty of laughter. These cards ought to be exchanged and kept as souvenirs.

Keep the menu very simple—bouillon, chicken croquettes and sandwiches, a salad and a little frozen dessert is a nice "spread"—and when luncheon is over each guest takes a bunch of flowers and ribbon from the May-pole.

The Little Temple of the Lord's Prayer

PERHAPS the most interesting, surely the most exquisite, house of prayer in the world is the Little Temple of the Lord's Prayer in Palestine, erected on the spot where it is believed the Saviour taught his prayer to the disciples. The little temple is of pure white marble with simple straight lines, distinctly unlike the architecture of the Orient. Our Father which art in heaven in every known language is carved on the walls and columns, and is the only decoration of this supremely lovely place. To see it in the soft opal twilight of the East, or at moonlight, or in the earliest dawn, is to understand the matchless words of the Master translated into marble.

A Baby Hero

DEAR AUNT IN THE COZY CORNER: You have spoken a great deal about heroism in Happy Cozy Corner Days recently. I believe that CHRISTIAN HERALD girls and boys will appreciate the bravery of little Stanley Osborne, an enthusiastic Cozy Corner boy.

The accompanying photograph will introduce to you my nephew, a thoughtful, manly youngster, who above all else loves his rollicking, happy-hearted baby sister of three.

Stanley Osborne

One day last October they were running about the field where their father was plowing, some distance away, when suddenly he heard a scream of alarm and was horrified, on looking up, to discover his little girl's clothing in flames. Her brother, standing near, quickly clasped his left arm about her neck and with a cap in his free hand beat the flames downward from her face. The father, arriving quickly, rolled the child on the ground until the fire was extinguished, but the frightened little girl was somewhat badly burned under one arm, and when the doctor heard what the brother had done in keeping the flames from her face, he declared the boy's ready wit had saved his sister's life. The fire was caught from some burning brush, and when we asked the bewildered little lad about the accident he said quite simply, "Father told me never to leave little sister in trouble, and if I ever found fire beginning anywhere to beat it out with my cap; so I did." Stanley was just five years old the month in which this happened. Very truly yours,

MRS. W. H. T.

Make Friends with Birds

BE SURE to make friends with the birds. Now is the time and you will always be glad to know them. Pay them a good deal of attention without ever startling them; they will grow so alert and important around the house with their cheery, pretty ways, and in the care of your garden the birds will help you beyond measure. Do not throw too many crumbs about, and they will eat up the insects that would otherwise destroy your plants. Learn to know their songs. Notice that they are different in the early nesting time from the later longer songs by which the baby birds learn their notes. Last year in a nest at my window a ruby crown seemed to pipe over and over, "Who are you? Who are you—eh—eh—" and when the limp little babies came, he added, note by note, to his frail song: "Sweet, sweet, sweet Marjorie, Marjorie—eh—eh—Marjorie—eh!"

Clove Hitch

Knot-tying Again

The three knots illustrated on this page, together with those we described last week, are the principal "hitches" in everyday use, which every boy should know how to make. Later we will show you in this department how to tie some interesting sailor knots, and fancy knots but little known.

Fisherman's Knot — Middleman's Knot

EDITOR'S NOTE.—Next week we shall publish in this department an excellent practical description of a Cross-Country Sailboat. All boy readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD must be sure to read this article.

Shredded Wheat Biscuit

With Strawberries and Cream

and nothing so easy to prepare. No cooking or baking—no culinary skill required. Shredded Wheat is ready-cooked and ready-to-serve. It is better than the white flour dough of ordinary shortcake because it contains the whole wheat steam-cooked, shredded and baked. The porous shreds take up the fruit juices, presenting them to the palate with all the full, rich aroma of the natural berry.

Heat one or more Shredded Wheat Biscuits in the oven to restore crispness; then cover with strawberries (or other berries) and serve with milk or cream, adding sugar to suit the taste.

Sunday School Lesson

time being. "Stop crying, father will bring you a pair of new shoes tonight" when in truth he had not been expected to do it. When father returns without the shoes, the child loses confidence in both parents, and has had an impressive lesson in lying. There are other parents who carefully train their children against lying. We have heard of a mother who carefully wrote in a little book all texts in the Bible concerning liars and lying. Whenever one of her children was guilty of lying she would take him alone and read from that same little book (she might have done better to read directly from the Bible), and then she would kneel with the child and ask God to help him keep to the truth, and also have the child pray for himself. Be assured that lying was not a sin of that family.

"I hate a liar," said a fond father, looking into the face of his little daughter. The child's face crimsoned and she burst out crying. "Then never lie again," he added. We cannot altogether commend the discipline, but it was effective, for the child was known on several occasions after that to check herself when she began lying. In another family a mother talked to her little four-year-old girl about a lie she had told, and said, "Now we will go downstairs and get some pepper to put on your tongue, and that is what I will have to do every time you lie." The mother took the child quietly downstairs and put the pepper on her tongue. It hurt, of course it did, but the little one bravely took her medicine, though the pain of body and mind caused her eyes to fill with tears.

Old Dr. Johnson once gave some good advice on this subject. He said to a company of friends: "Above all, accustom your children constantly to tell the truth, without varying in any circumstance." A lady present impatiently exclaimed: "Nay, this is too much, for a little variation in narrative must happen a thousand times a day if one is not perpetually watching." "Well, madam," replied the doctor, "and you ought to be perpetually watching. It is more from carelessness about the truth than from intentional lying that there is so much falsehood in the world."

Jesus Rebuked Lying

In his Sermon on the Mount the Lord Jesus guarded well the avenues that lead to lying, when he said, "Thou shalt not forswear thyself." This was not making a point against false witness in court so much as it was a rebuke against extravagant expressions commonly used by the sort of people to whom he was talking. They were Orientals, and so accustomed to lying that they did not expect to be believed unless they supported their statements by oaths. Dr. Thomson, a distinguished traveler in the Orient, and author of The Land and the Book, says: "No people that I have ever known can compare with these Orientals for profaneness in the use of the names and attributes of God. The evil habit seems inveterate and universal. . . . The people now use the very same sort of oaths that are mentioned and condemned by our Lord. They swear by their head, by their life, by heaven, and by the temple, or, what is in its place, the church. The forms of cursing and swearing, however, are almost infinite, and fall on the pained ear all day long." The Orient is not the only place where this sort of thing prevails. There are persons in the United States who hardly make a statement without connecting an oath with it. We must commend the movement called "The Holy Name Society," organized for the purpose of leading men more perfectly to keep the command, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain," and also to develop reverence for God and check the vile habit of swearing. Churches of all denominations and Sunday schools might well do a similar work.

In the lesson we are studying to-day the avenues that lead to lying are further guarded by taking up in general the sins of the tongue as they are referred to in the Epistle of James. His words would seem to be only second in importance to the words of Jesus himself, and we are quite prepared to agree with him that the tongue is "a fire," and as such is to be guarded against getting started; that "the tongue is full of deadly poison," not in itself, but only as we allow it to become poisoned by the evil that is in our hearts; that "it is a restless evil," and the more evil it is, the more restless it is, and its wagging easily becomes lying or blaspheming. We are almost inclined to accept the advice of the sage of Plunketville, who said, "Allers think twict before speakin', an' then—keep your mouth shut." But James expresses it thus: "But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by the heaven, nor by the earth, nor by any other oath, but let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay."

But it is not enough to warn against lying by word of mouth when lying can be done by acts as well as by words. Mark Twain said he had found prejudice against the spoken lie, but none against any other; and by examination and mathematical computation he had found the proportion of the spoken lie to the other varieties to be as one to 22,894. Then he says: "What I am arriving at is this: When whole races and peoples conspire to propagate gigantic mute lies in the interest of tyrannies and shams, why should we care anything about the trifling lies told by individuals?" His premises are correct, but his conclusion is facetious. He took his own jocular way of teaching us that when we succeed in curing the individual liars, we shall have a nation that will be true in all of its relations to God and man.

The Law of the Sea

BY DAVID PAINE, of the New York Bar

WHEN the Titanic of the White Star Line went down she carried with her to her resting-place, two miles below the surface, not only hundreds of valuable lives but several million dollars of cargo. This cargo, of course, cannot be recovered at that depth. Divers cannot live that far below the surface because of the great pressure of the water. In the natural course of events neither ship nor cargo will ever again be seen by the eye of man. The question now arises as to what redress the law gives to those who have lost relatives or merchandise entrusted to this great ship.

To those who are familiar with the general administration of the law in this country it would seem that, if the disaster was caused by the negligence of the captain of the ship or its officers, suits could be brought against the owners of the Titanic and damages recovered commensurate with the loss sustained by those dependent upon the victims or owning the cargo. Actions of this character are an everyday occurrence when, for instance, a train is wrecked on land and lives and property lost. Accidents at sea, however, are governed by the Admiralty law, which differs greatly from the law we are accustomed to. The Constitution of the United States gives to the United States courts jurisdiction of "all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," and Congress has the power to pass laws governing such matters. Admiralty law, in general, has to do with commerce upon the high seas and the Great Lakes. The laws we are accustomed to think of as securing to us our lives and property are the creations of the legislatures of our several States, and are enforced by the State courts. The wisdom of a uniform law to govern ships upon their voyages, rather than a different law in each port the vessel may make, is, of course, apparent. Congress and the United States District Courts, then, having exclusive powers as to the law of the seas, have formulated a uniform set of rules applying to the subject, and the same law governs, no matter whether the ship is in the port of New York or San Francisco, Galveston or Portland, Me.

In 1851, in order to encourage shipbuilding and having in mind the perils of the sea, Congress enacted the Limited Liability Act, applying to shipowners. By its terms, as it has been expanded, the owner of a ship can by appropriate proceedings in the Federal courts, after a loss at sea, limit his liability, as to the passengers and cargo, to the value of the ship and the freight charges earned. Now, in case a ship is brought into port after an accident at sea, her value, even in a damaged condition, is generally more than enough to compensate for any loss sustained, but in case of the sinking of the ship with her passengers and cargo the ship is without value and no money damages can be recovered, except the freight charges earned, which are so insignificant when divided up among those entitled to share therein that they amount to nothing. Most seafaring nations have a similar law.

A notable instance of this was in the case of the loss of the French Liner La Bourgogne, which sank with most of its passengers after a collision with the British ship Cromartyshire sixty miles off Sable Island, on its voyage from New York to Havre, on July 4, 1898. Nothing was saved except a few lifeboats, and the value of these and the freight charges pending constituted the only fund from which damages could be collected under the Limited Liability Act. The wealthy steamship company which owned the vessel could not be reached beyond this. Litigation growing out of claims against La Bourgogne continued for ten years, and it was not until 1908 that Justice White of the United States Supreme Court wrote a final opinion in this matter.

With regard to the loss of the Titanic, an important exception in the Limited Liability Act must be noticed. That Act does not limit to the value of the ship, the liability of the ship-owner on whose ship lives or property are lost by negligence of which the owner has knowledge. If he provides a safe ship and conforms to the laws of the country to which the ship belongs as to the life-saving equipment, and selects competent officers and crew, he can claim the benefits of the Act, no matter if the officers in charge prove negligent and the ship is lost. The Titanic, however, had on board J. Bruce Ismay, the head of the company owning the ship. Now, if it should be shown that Ismay carelessly and knowingly directed or allowed the ship to be driven at high speed through waters dangerous from icebergs, or if the ship was not properly equipped with lifeboats in accordance with the rules of the British Board of Trade, then the courts might well hold that the loss was caused by negligence of which the owners of the Titanic, the White Star Line, had knowledge, and damages for the loss of lives and cargo would have to be met in full by the company, irrespective of the value of the lost Titanic. In other words, the Limited Liability Act would not apply. The importance, therefore, of the present investigation by the Senate committee cannot be overestimated, leaving aside its chief aim, which is to prevent such catastrophes in the future.

The Paper That Helps Them Most

THE Erie Conference (M. E.) Male Quartette recently assisted the Young Men's Christian Association in a special ten days' campaign in the shops of Warren, Pa. The Warren Young Men's Christian Association conducts each year about three hundred noon-hour shop meetings. A feature of this work in Warren is the use the Association makes of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Hundreds of copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are distributed each week at the shop meetings. The secretary writes us that the only Christian literature that enters many of the homes of the workingmen is THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and it is proving of great help in maintaining the attendance on the part of the men at the meetings.

The Erie Conference Male Quartette

DO YOU KNOW that the old Egyptians, 5,000 years B. C., had a bible which they called the "Book of the Dead"?—Do you know that the Assyrian sacred literature gives the story of the Creation?—Do you know that Babylon, not Rome, was the real "Mother of Law," and that fully 7,000 years ago they had a complete system of laws and courts? Do you know that the "Atomic Theory" was discovered by Lucretius the Roman almost 2,000 years before Dalton announced to the world his startling discovery.—Do you know that Columbus wrote a journal of his voyages to the new world and that it has been found, translated and published?—DID YOU EVER READ the Ball and Tyler Rebellion?—Luther's "Ninety-five Theses"—which he nailed to the church door?—Machiavelli's "Prince"? or Harvey's personal story of the discovery of the circulation of the blood.

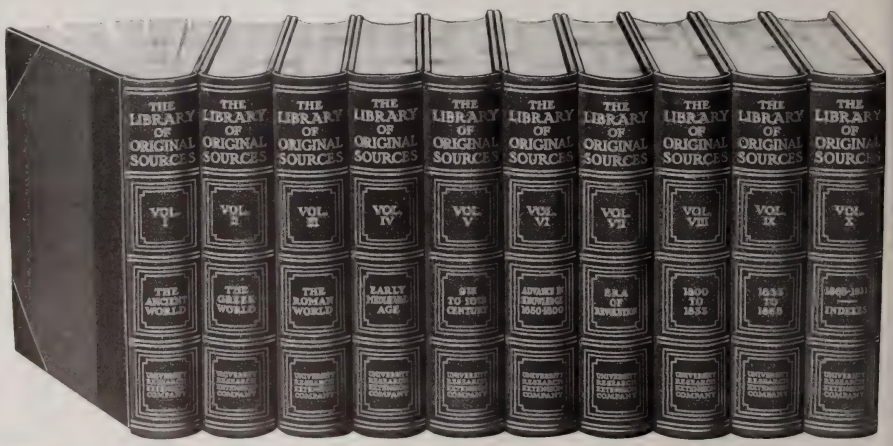
YOU'LL FIND THEM ALL—and thousands of others equally as curious and important—in The Library of Original Sources. Every document is in the exact words of the original, translated; every contribution is from the actual eye-witness or person who took part: every idea is in the words of the thinker, investigator, discoverer or inventor.

"Deserves a welcome to the library of every one. Indispensable to any reader who wishes to get the facts themselves."
EUGENE W. HENDRIX,
Bishop M. E. Church, Chicago, Ill.

"The Library of Original Sources is an encyclopædia of original documents arranged in chronological order, covering every idea, fact, invention, discovery, from the earliest times down to the present. A necessary work for every family."
Prof. HENRY CAREW,
Northwestern University.

"Is of great importance and unlike anything of the kind ever before published."
Prof. T. J. BURRILL,
University of Illinois.

"The documents contained in the Library of Original Sources are essential not only for the specialist, but for every reader. To have before us in their original form the ideas that have influenced civilization takes us into the very secret of human development."
CHAS. J. LITTLE, D.D.
Late President Garrett Bible Institute.



THIS MARVELLOUS WORK is revolutionizing modern thought. It's turning upside down old notions and ideas. It gives the authoritative, rock-bottom sources of our knowledge on ALL SUBJECTS OF HUMAN INTEREST from the earliest civilization down to today—the inside facts which the average person has never even heard of. Encyclopædias, histories, etc., merely tell you about things—in The Library of Original Sources you get the things themselves — the fountain heads of knowledge to where encyclopædia writers, historians, etc., have to go for their information.

OVER 100 RESEARCH SPECIALISTS spent 10 years gathering the contents of this great work. Ancient and remote and forgotten civilizations in all parts of the globe were uncovered, and age-buried hieroglyphics on monuments, tablets, sun-baked bricks and palimpsests yielded their secrets: untiring workers ransacked the hidden literature of every age, ancient, mediæval and modern, to find the "original documents" that shaped the civilizations and influenced the thought and life of the world. Nothing like it has ever been attempted or thought of before. You'll be amazed at the wealth of information this unique library contains.

There are ten sumptuous, massive volumes, bound in rich, deep red Persian Morocco; full page photogravures, on India Vellum, pure silk headbands, printed in large clear type on hand-made, pure white, antique finished paper with gold tops — a veritable triumph of the bookmaker's art.

F. D. M., Sugargrove, Pa. 1. Do the Jews in this country observe the feasts and offer sacrifices, as was commanded in the Mosaic law? 2. Do they reckon time from Christ; if not, when does their year commence?

1. Many of the orthodox Jews still observe the old-time feasts and some yet offer sacrifices, such as fruits, grain, doves and sheep; but the great majority have fallen away from the ancient observances and identify themselves with the manners and customs of the country in which they live. 2. No. The Jews, since the second century, reckon from the assumed date of the creation, or 3,760 years and three months before the birth of Christ. This is the year ; the new year 5673 will begin at sunset on next September 11.

M. A. M., Wallowa, Ore. 1. Are fire-arms [illegible] 2. What do you think of the movement?

1. For the purposes of drill boy scouts are [illegible] military regulation rifles without ammunition. 2. The movement is a good one from a disciplinary standpoint and as excellent exercise; but it has the objectionable feature of inspiring a love of war and military display.

A. D. F., Scranton, Ia. 1. Will the Titanic reach the bottom of the ocean? 2. What is the method of sounding and what is the maximum depth?

1. Such solids as compose a ship, whether it be of steel or wood, may be kept floating or be allowed to sink very slowly, due to the nearness of their specific gravity to that of water, or to the fact that they contain air or other substances whose specific gravity is much less than that of water. The moment the specific gravity of the floating substance becomes even a minute fraction greater than that of water it will sink, and as the specific gravity of water is the same at the bottom of the sea as at the surface, it will sink to the bottom. 2. C. C. W., Springfield, Colo. What proportion of the total popular vote of the United States is represented by church members?

There are upwards of 36,000,000 professing Christians in the United States, 13,000,000 of whom are Roman Catholics. The various Protestant denominations can claim many as nominal adherents who are not communicants. Therefore, as the total population is about 100,000,000, it is safe to say that nine out of every twenty-five are professed Christians.

D. B. L., Oval, S. D. Please explain John 1: 13.

The apostle is here describing the new birth, and pointing to its Author and Source. It was "not of blood," that is, of superior human descent (as we should say, "blue-blooded") nor of the will of the flesh, nor the will of man; it was in no sense human generation, but was of God. It conferred the divine gift of sonship, raising men to the altitude of "sons of God."

"In His Name," Billings, Mont. Could you tell us more about the China orphans, how they are cared for, and what denominations have charge of the work? Where are the orphanages located? Have the gifts already received been at all adequate in relieving the need?

The orphanages and the denominations represented are these: China Inland Mission, Taochsien; Methodist, Hinghwa; Friends, Nanking; Methodist, Ngucheng; Baptist, Changsha; Wesleyan Methodist, Hankow; China Inland Mission, Wesleyan Mission, Methodist, Independent, Presbyterian, Nanking; South Presbyterian, Hsuchoufu; American Episcopal, Ichang; Missionary Alliance, Sianfu; China Inland Mission, Sinchunghsien; North Presbyterian, Hangchow; American Advent, Nanking; Methodist, Chinkiang; Methodist and Industrial Home, Foochow; [illegible] Congregational, Foochow; China Inland Mission, Saratsi; Door of Hope, Shanghai; Presbyterian, Chinkiang; Methodist, Kiukiang; American Presbyterian, Ningpo; Presbyterian, Shanghai; Methodist, Nanking; China Inland Mission, Antung. The orphans are sheltered, fed, educated and trained by the missionaries until they are of age to work and become self-supporting. Many have become teachers, evangelists, Bible workers, etc., others are now artisans and servants. A good many of the children are bright and full of promise. Twenty dollars a year provides for the support of an orphan through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

J. N. G., Worcester, Mass. Do you think it possible for a person to be a Christian and not realize the fact?

While in isolated cases such a condition may exist, or while it may exist temporarily in many cases, it is certainly not a normal experience or condition. John says: "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself." Really to be a Christian is to be personally acquainted with Jesus, and if we really know him we shall soon know that we know him. If any one wants to know him and is not yet sure, he has only to trust him fully as the pardoner of his sins, and he will soon know him as Saviour and Friend. If the assurance is delayed, keep on trusting just the same, and it will surely come, when faith has been sufficiently tested.

A. L. L., Waterloo. The following questions were discussed in a recent conversation, and we should like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S opinion: (1) Shall we know each other in heaven? (2) Will the same relationships continue in heaven as exist on earth, or shall we know one another simply as members of the heavenly company, not distinguishing friends and relatives from strangers?

(1) There seems to be no Scriptural reason for doubt that we shall know one another in heaven. Jesus said to the crucified thief: "This day thou shalt be with me in paradise," implying that the identity of both could be easily recognized. He said to the disciples: "I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am there ye may be also." All the thoughts and promises of immortality would have little attractiveness unless we believed that the identity of ourselves and of our friends would be preserved, and preserved in such a way as to be recognizable. We do not want to go to heaven to be some one else, but to be ourselves, made glad, efficient and glorious for the new life and the new service. (2) When David's son died he said: "I shall go to him, but he shall never come to me." These words show that David expected to greet the boy as his son and be recognized as his father. The answer of Jesus to the Sadducees in Matt. 22: 30, Mark 12: 25, and Luke 20: 35 does not mean that the relation of husband and wife will be discontinued in heaven. It is a recognition of the fact that many marriages of earth are not real marriages of soul. A tie which is merely or chiefly physical will be dissolved when the bodily existence ceases or is changed; but any real union of soul need not be affected by death, for death does not touch the soul. The whole question becomes clear in the light of the fundamental idea of love, which receives its highest interpretation and illumination in the New Testament. People who love one another on earth will love one another in heaven; people who are congenial on earth will be congenial in heaven. It will be not the mere fact of physical relationship or earthly friendship that will draw souls together in heaven, but the fact of their loving Christ, of their sympathy and interest and delight in his will, in his ways, in his work. And people who love him together and work for him together here will love him and work for him together there.

Mrs. C. J. C., Hastings, Neb. Please explain Gen. 1: 27 and 2: 7, 22.

There is no discrepancy in these two separate accounts. Gen. 1: 27 states the fact broadly that God created man and woman. The next chapter goes on to give the details of the events.

E. F., New Albany, Kan. Did Jesus have any brothers or half-brothers?

James, Joses, Judas and Simon are mentioned in the New Testament as the brethren of Jesus. Jerome and several other early writers held that the word "brother" was frequently used in the sense of a "cousin" or blood relative, and that Mary had no other children; but in Matt. 12: 46; Matt. 13: 55; John 2: 12 and Acts 1: 14 they are mentioned as proper brothers, being named together with the mother of Jesus. The same may be inferred from John 7: 5. It is an open question whether they were not the sons of Joseph by a former marriage and therefore half-brothers to Jesus. There has been much discussion of the subject, but without positive determination.

Opening The Nathan Straus Tuberculosis Preventorium

LATE in April there was opened at Farmingdale, N. J., a new preventorium for tuberculosis. Governor Wilson of New Jersey and Bishop McFaul, of Trenton, addressed the gathering, which contained a great many people from New York as well as representatives from other States. Governor Wilson brought a message of good wishes and hopes for success from President Taft. After the ceremonies the crowd which had gathered inspected the new building, together with its camps and the equipment, which comprises the institution. Marcus M. Marks, president of the preventorium, delivered the opening address, in which he told of the work of the preventorium and outlined the purposes of the new home. He said: "Our plan is to take the children from homes in which they are exposed to tuberculosis infection, keep them in the open air day and night, winter and summer; keep them up to school grade in open air classes, and after a few months return them hearty and strong to homes that have been built up and rendered safe during their absence." Governor Wilson said he was glad the great work was being done in New Jersey, and continued: "We have coped with diseases in the past by curing them, but to-day we are coping with them by preventing them. It always has given me pain to note how far behind other countries we are in the prevention of disease. However, we are awakening to the value of scientific discoveries, and science is now becoming one of the principal instrumentalities of government."

Miscellaneous

R. J., Bucyrus, O. Recently answered in THE MAIL-BAG.

Mrs. T. A. A., Garber, O. There is nothing to indicate that the passage you mention has any reference to the birth of Christ.

J. M. F., Staunton, Va. The first passage you mention does not refer to a command of God, but to a command given to the Rechabites by Jonadab, one of their ancestors. He evidently wished them to lead a nomadic rather than a settled life. The last verse expresses the approval of God upon them because they were true to their principles. The prophet declares the sad comparison God has made: the Rechabites obeyed their earthly father's wishes, but the people of Israel would not obey their heavenly Father's precepts.

Honest Inquirer, Plainfield, N. J. 1. After Dr. Talmage's death his congregation was distributed among other churches. 2. The Gospel is not complete unless Christ is presented as the central fact. He is the Way, the Truth, the Life. He is the door of the sheepfold, and we have his word for it that any one that entereth by any other way is a thief and a robber. All the evangelists, both in the Gospels and the Epistles, emphasize the fact that faith in Christ and acceptance of him as Saviour and Redeemer are essential requirements. Hence a presentation of the Gospel without presenting Christ as Saviour would be no presentation at all.

The Best Kind of a Gift

Many thanks for the book, Samantha at Coney Island. I have read "the hull on't," and enjoyed it very much. Let me add also that The Christian Herald Almanac is, in my opinion, the best kind of a gift premium, and will certainly be appreciated by many thousands besides MRS. C. J. WOHLFARTH.

A River City Scene During the Flood

THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY DISASTER

OVER $50,000,000 IN PROPERTY SWEPT AWAY. MANY LIVES LOST AND THOUSANDS MORE IMPERILED

RUIN, death and desolation reign almost undisputed over a vast section of the lower valley of the Mississippi. The greatest flood in our country's history has swept the populations of hundreds of river cities and towns and parishes into refuge camps at the points of safety. On May 8 a conservative estimate stated that 200,000 people had been driven from their flooded homes and were, in spite of heroic efforts by the people of the unflooded sections, largely shelterless and dependent upon others for food.

As the waters abated in the upper reaches of the valley, the gravest danger was believed to be past, for Arkansas, Mississippi and Louisiana felt safe, entrenched behind their great levees that had secured the commendation of both State and Federal engineers, even though their network of low-lying waterways faced the prodigious task of carrying off the freshets of thirty-two States.

During the last days of April the waters crept higher and higher on the levees and through old, unimportant breaks backed up over some of the lowlands, but did no serious damage. Undiminished, the torrents from the Arkansas, the Red River and the Mississippi attacked the levees that had been softened by days of constant rain. In Louisiana wealthy planters and stock-farmers, professional men and university students toiled steadily side by side with negro roustabouts and a convict gang in their desperate efforts to save the levees with reinforcements of sandbags. On the night of May 1 came the first serious break. The levees at Torras, La., gave way before the flood and the combined torrents of the Red and Mississippi Rivers swept southward, covering the great sugar-cane district that is known as the "sugar bowl of America." Torras is at the junction of the Mississippi, the Red and the Atchafalaya Rivers. Ordinarily the Red River flows into the Mississippi, and the Atchafalaya finds its way to the Gulf of Mexico by a route almost parallel to the general direction of the larger stream. But now all this is changed, and the waters of the three rivers unite to form an inland sea whose current flows toward the gulf and which has practically obliterated the lines of the Atchafalaya River.

Day after day the flooded area has widened and one small town after another has been deserted by its inhabitants. Some got away in trains, taking part of their livestock with them, but many were marooned in almost desperate positions and had to be picked up by steamers and motor-boats. Large sections of fifteen parishes in Louisiana alone are devastated by the flood and it is estimated that 115,000 homeless persons are being cared for as well as possible in the refuge camps and that many thousands more will within the next few days be added to this number. Every day brings stories of suffering from newly inundated sections. Millions of dollars' worth of property has already been destroyed and thousands of lives are still in danger.

The government's relief officers have been spread over as much of the country as possible, but the task is almost too great for them. On Sunday, May 5, over a thousand refugees arrived at Baton Rouge to be cared for. The condition of many of these people was pitiable in the extreme. Some had been in their wet clothing for days and among the women and children the suffering was acute. The plight of the tiny children was particularly distressing because of the scarcity of milk. All the Sunday schools in Baton Rouge were dismissed that afternoon that the children might work under team leaders to make a thorough canvass of the city for milk and take it to the supply depots for distribution.

On the following night, at a point of the levee between Torras and Batchelor, it was estimated that there were one thousand refugees and ten thousand head of cattle. All of the refugees were exposed to imminent danger of drowning, and their presence in the upset conditions added great difficulty to the strengthening of the earthen walls. From almost every section of the lower valley there have come frantic appeals for boats, for food, for dry clothing and blankets. Crafts of every sort are being pressed into service and sent out loaded for temporary relief; but still there are thousands marooned and beyond hope of relief with the facilities at hand.

In addition to the number of deaths that are known to have taken place, due to the great break in the Dogtail Levee, refugees have been arriving at New Orleans in small overloaded boats and telling of many cases of drowning and of thousands of men, women and children huddled together in inaccessible places along the levees, mostly without food or adequate clothing, and in many cases with no means of sending out word of their plight. The work of rescuing marooned persons in the back country and more isolated districts has been pushed forward as rapidly as possible. Every available boat has brought into the concentration camps loads of destitute women and children. Reports of almost horrifying conditions have been brought into New Roads, Baton Rouge and New Orleans.

Among those who arrived at New Roads were four women who were rescued near Morganza. They had stood in water several feet deep for nearly three days before boatmen reached them. They were on the verge of collapse when saved and had lost everything except the dripping clothing that they wore. Seven hundred and fifty refugees from Pointe Coupée Parish were taken into Melville, even though that town itself was in the gravest danger and was already being deserted by its inhabitants. These people had been picked up along the levee where they had been three days without shelter while an almost continuous pelting rain had made it impossible for them to get a fire with which to cook the scanty rations that they had. Melville, itself almost depopulated, was not prepared to care for these refugees, but rations from the government barges were distributed among them, and fires were kindled in some of the dry streets and there coffee was made and passed around in dippers. Later the refugees were sent on to points of absolute safety.

Under the direction of army engineers the removal of twenty thousand persons from the vicinity of New Roads was undertaken as soon as grave danger of the flooding of that town arose. A fleet of steamboats carried the refugees to Cook's Landing, the nearest place available as a concentration station. The government engineer reported even before the flood reached its height that there were at least eight crevasses in the levee system of Louisiana. The greatest of these is at Torras, two others are on the Atchafalaya River near Melville, one at Bayou Sara and one at Angola, on the Mississippi; one at Moreauville, one at Long Bridge, and others at Alsatia and above. In reply to a telegram, Governor Sanders has wired:

"The resources of the commonwealth and its population are being strained to the utmost, the Federal Government appropriations covering only the barest basic rations and the employment of boats for saving lives and livestock. The additional expense of establishing and maintaining camps and their sanitation and a hundred and one incidental expenses fall upon the people of this commonwealth."

The latest reports state that the flood waters are still spreading, and as this takes place and the numbers in the concentration camps increase, the desperate need of food, clothing, medical aid and medicine will become more and more pressing. Many of these concentration camps must, in the very nature of events, be permanent villages until well on into July, even if not much later. Vast sections of the Mississippi Valley will raise no crops this year, and not only will need of the present be met, but that of the future.

A Typical Lower Mississippi Valley Scene with the Flood Nearing Its Height

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will receive contributions in aid of the Mississippi flood sufferers. Every gift to the Flood Fund will be used in the relief work which is now going on over a very large extent of the river territory from the "back country" of Louisiana up to Memphis and Cairo. It is hoped that our readers, who have done so much in past years for the needy in foreign lands, will now respond promptly and liberally to the call of distress at home. TRAINING BOYS TO BE CITIZENS

ON CHICAGO'S South Side is a well-organized juvenile municipality that boasts its mayor, its city clerk, its city treasurer and most of the usual officers of any well-regulated community. It has its own board of education, its commissioner of health, its common council and various other bodies that are a part of every municipality. Its seat of government is St. Paul's parish house. Its citizenship is composed of boys between the ages of nine and nineteen. Boyville—for such is the name by which this municipality is known—seeks to train boys in the duties of good citizenship so that when they arrive at manhood's estate they may both understand the essential elements of good government and be prepared to work and vote intelligently to this end. At the regular weekly meetings of the Boyville city council its members receive a thorough training in parliamentary law and become familiar with the machinery of legislation through the introduction and passage of such laws and ordinances as may seem necessary for the good government of this juvenile municipality.

The annual election in Boyville is accompanied by quite as much enthusiasm as any hard-fought municipal campaign. The election falls on the same date as the regular city election, and is preceded by bill-posting, caucus meetings, processions and other methods of increasing interest among the citizens of Boyville in an effort to gain votes. "Vote for Wabert. He plays on the square." "Vote for Koehler and a clean Boyville." "Vote for Marshall for postmaster. He will carry the message to Garcia." "McCarty. He knows how to work." These are some of the slogans that have become historic in the municipal campaigns of Boyville. Following election, the citizens of this municipality hold their annual inaugural exercises with a banquet and speeches by the officers elect in which they give pledge for faithful service during the coming year.

A Boyville Caucus in Full Swing

Election Day in Boyville

Boyville has its game-rooms, its reading-rooms, its gymnasium and other features of club life in the parish house of St. Paul's Church, Prairie Avenue and Thirtieth Street. Rev. Lorenzo D. Case, D.D., who is at the head of its many activities, states that the citizens of Boyville have become especially orderly and need but a minimum of adult oversight during the hours that the rooms of the parish house are open to them. Each citizen is on his honor and wears the badge of Boyville with its motto, "Play on the Square." In the summer every officer of this juvenile municipality who has faithfully performed the duties for which he was elected is given a two weeks' free outing at the Boyville summer camp in Michigan.

BURYING THE "TITANIC'S" DEAD

Photos Copyrighted by American Press

Temporary Morgues on the Dock — The Cable Steamer "Mackay-Bennett" Docking at Halifax — A Scene at the Mayflower Curling Rink

THE historic garrison city of Halifax, Nova Scotia, had a May-day of mourning when the cable steamer Mackay-Bennett came into port with the bodies of those victims of the Titanic disaster that she had recovered from the sea. The work of identification and the long lines of funerals began on the following day. At three o'clock that afternoon nearly all of the nameless sixty of the Titanic's dead were buried in nameless graves in three of the Halifax cemeteries.

Most of the identified dead were removed from the Mayflower Curling Rink during the first and second days after the arrival of the funeral ship. Those who had come with faint hopes that they might identify their lost were in most cases disappointed, and though many of them remained in Halifax for the return of the second cable steamer, Minia, the second day found Halifax returning to its normal routine of life. All of the fifty-nine unidentified bodies were interred according to the rites of the religions the deceased had professed in life. Men and women of every creed united in honoring the unknown. Four bodies were buried in the Catholic cemetery, nine in the Jewish cemetery, and forty-six in the Protestant cemetery. At the ceremonies at the Protestant cemetery, one hundred sailors from H. M. C. S. Niobe formed in lines at the graves. Brief addresses were made by clergymen of different denominations and the Royal Canadian Regiment band played "Nearer, My God, to Thee" and the "Dead March from Saul." Memorial services at all the churches testified to the sympathy and sorrow of Halifax over the great disaster.

The Nova Scotia Legislature was prorogued on the afternoon of May 3, but out of respect for the dead all the brilliant military formalities attending such an event were abandoned. Probably for the first time in the history of the Province there were no strains of martial music on the streets, such as has been the custom at the closing of the House in the past.

The cable steamer Minia came into the harbor in the early hours of May 6, bringing fifteen more bodies of victims of the disaster. She recovered seventeen altogether, but it was necessary to re-commit the bodies of two men, supposed to have been firemen, to the deep. The list of identified dead brought in by the Minia included the name of Charles M. Hays, president of the Grand Trunk Railway system of Canada. The bodies of the more widely known victims of the disaster have been all taken to the homes of the deceased, where memorial services and deeply pathetic funeral services have taken place.

The Minia was compelled to abandon her search by the coming up of a dense fog and the combined knowledge that she could do little more at sea, and that many were anxiously awaiting her arrival at Halifax.

The work of searching for the bodies is being continued, however, for the Canadian Government steamer Montmagny was immediately coaled and provisioned for ten days and started to search the edges of the Gulf Stream, where it is believed still other bodies may be found. The Montmagny had been undergoing repairs at Halifax, and that work had just been concluded when the White Star Line officials petitioned the government to allow them the use of the vessel. At first the officials of the Marine Department at Ottawa were disinclined to let the vessel go, but when a request was made direct to Premier Borden he requested the Minister of Marine to order the ship out. Immediately after the despatch of the vessel Premier Borden received the following message from Vice President Franklin of the White Star Line:

"On behalf of the relatives and friends of those lost in the Titanic disaster, also on behalf of the White Star Line, I want to express to you and through you to the Canadian Government and the Canadian people our very deep appreciation and sincere thanks for the prompt and generous manner in which you have acted upon our appeal to have a suitable steamer sent out to the scene of disaster by despatching the Montmagny."

HELPING CHINA'S FAMINE ORPHANS

THAT the work of caring for the famine waifs of China is very near and dear to the hearts of the mission workers in that newest republic is shown by the letters that come from the distant field. Through all these months of war and its attendant unsettled conditions, the workers have been striving to keep in touch with those whom it became necessary to leave behind when all foreigners were ordered to the coast for safety.

Mr. C. J. Jensen, in charge of the Scandinavian Alliance Mission in Shensi and Kansuh, writes an interesting report concerning the orphans under his charge. He says: "On October 22, the revolution broke out in Sianfu and upset all missionary work. When we understood we must leave, we tried to make as good provision for the children as we could. Some were let out to Christian families and relatives, we advancing means for their support, and they were to look after them during our absence. Quite a number were left at the stations as usual, in charge of native evangelists and Bible-women. Happily the mission could advance enough to keep them going about a year, though we hope to be back in less time than that. We are trying to keep up communication with our native workers who are in charge, but it has been very difficult so far and very slow at the best. As far as we know all are safe. Of the orphans who left or are leaving, some have good prospects of being able to take care of themselves. One has received a fairly good education and by the assistance of his two older brothers (who have also been CHRISTIAN HERALD orphans), he will be able to get on. Another will soon be married and thus she will be cared for. A third is getting quite old enough to be trying for himself.

A Group of the Famine Orphans Now Being Supported

Another has learned the shoemaker's trade. Two others are now strong boys, able to work. Two more have got situations, and there are others who will now be employed to help the native evangelists at two outstations. We are very thankful for the help these boys have had from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and we hope they will prove a real help and blessing to the church. Two others had also nearly finished their three years' course at the seminary, and will now be employed as helpers in Gospel work. There are still several who are not capable of taking care of themselves, and we shall have to try to help them somehow. Quite a number of former orphans are now doing good work as teachers and evangelists."

The orphans to whom Mr. Jensen refers as being as yet unable to care for themselves are a part of the seven hundred for whose support THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is now working. It is our earnest hope that we may be able to make it unnecessary to abandon these children before they have reached a self-supporting age. All contributions to the support of the famine orphans in China should be sent to the "China Famine Orphan Fund," CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York. Every contribution will be acknowledged. Due to lack of space acknowledgments of further contributions received must be postponed until our next issue.

THE ABUNDANT LIFE

TEXT: "I came that they may have life, and may have it abundantly." John 10: 10 (R. V.)

THE test of a religion is in what it does for those who profess it. What does Mohammedanism do for those who believe in it? What has Hinduism done for the believers in Hinduism? What are the fruits of Buddhism for women and childhood in its native land? This is a fair test for any religious faith and it is the test which inevitably is applied. The only sure argument for any religion is, "By their fruits ye shall know them."

The avowed purpose of Jesus was in his own statement. He said he came into the world to give people life abundantly. That was in one sense what might be called his plan of campaign. It was his object, and he committed himself to it without reservation.

It is a fair question to ask, "What did he mean by abundant life?" and, "Has he succeeded in giving to the world what he said he came to give?"

Freedom of Opportunity

1. To start with, there is little doubt that by abundant life Jesus would mean the right of every human being who enters the world to be well born. Three things stand in the way of this at the beginning of an abundant life. They are: first, disease; second, environment; and third, injustice, social or industrial.

There are thousands of children born into the world through no fault or wish of their own, who are tainted with disease which has been contracted by their parents, generally, we may say, through sinful habits, or through some breaking of God's law. The time has come when the civilized world should not hesitate to say some very plain truths about the bearing of children. The minister of the Gospel may do great work in helping this fundamental need by demanding of those who present themselves for marriage a clean bill of health, physical and mental, from some reputable physician. Every day people are being married who have no right to bring children into the world. The time will come when the State will also demand through its legislation that marriages shall not be contracted without physical and mental examination. We take great pains in the breeding of animals, and a man who is rearing stock for a living would be considered a fool, or worse, who bred diseased cattle, that is, knowingly. The human being is more careless concerning the birth of human beings than of any other creature.

The environment of childhood often forbids free opportunity for growth. The slum child does not have a free opportunity for abundant life. Social and industrial wrong also choke the avenues of free opportunity, and the abundant life is not possible for thousands of human beings owing to the fact that their bodies and minds are repressed by the necessity for child labor and by unwholesome surroundings.

Freedom from Fear

2. By abundant life Jesus meant freedom from fear. Millions of people live continually under great clouds of fear. There are five great causes. First, the fear of death; second, the fear of poverty or want; third, fear of sickness and old age; fourth, fear of failure; and fifth, the fear of other people. Any one of these causes of fear paralyzes effort, and makes impossible a free life and an abundant life, such as Jesus came to give. There is no doubt that faith in Jesus dispels all these fears. "Perfect love casteth out fear." It is true that "fear hath torment," and it is also true that thousands of people live all their lives long subject to one or another of these fears. It is to release human beings from fear that Jesus came, and the abundant life follows almost immediately when the fear is dissipated.

3. Jesus meant by abundant life opportunity to enrich life with its common sources of enrichment.

The six prominent sources of enrichment which help to make abundant life are: first, education; second, travel; third, friendship; fourth, entertainment; fifth, knowledge of literature, music, art, history, etc.; sixth, the common heritage, like inventions, etc., which help to make life happier and stronger.

Every human being has a right to an education. Yet very few have either the leisure or the opportunity for it in comparison with the entire world population. Travel is a great source of enrichment of life; yet comparatively few of the world's toilers can ever travel. Friendship is something which requires the leisure period of life. It is almost necessary for the acquisition of real helpful friendship that a person have leisure time. The great craving of the people for entertainment goes without argument. It is seen on every side. In a Western city of three hundred thousand people, in one year's time, over five million dollars is spent by the people in theatres and moving picture shows, etc. This is more than the entire amount of money spent to maintain the public school system of that city and the entire expenses of the municipal government twice over. This craving for entertainment is one which Jesus recognized. The abundant life should contain in it something which would answer that craving. It is doubtful if our modern methods of entertaining people are always to be commended. But it is worth a great study of the question to note how greatly Christian sentiment is demanding of all entertainment that it shall be something more than merely amusement and contain in it at least some elements of instruction. Knowledge of literature, music, art, etc., is implied in the abundant life. The more we know of the beauties of the world into which we are born, of the things which make us nobler, more contented and more wise, the richer we are and the nearer we approach the standard which Jesus set; and this would be true of all enrichment of life which came from having in our possession or reach the common and helpful inventions of life.

4. By the abundant life, Jesus must have meant the sharing of life with others.

World-Wide Sympathies

Sharing life with others calls for (1) absence of regard for social prejudice; (2) opportunities to gratify this world companionship which would mean the absence of war, of fear, of hate, and of personal pride; (3) the use of imagination.

It might help greatly in the development of our lives if we could accustom ourselves to the thought of changing places with others. Let the man who is employing labor imagine himself in the place of those who are working for him. Let him imagine that he would be obliged to start out in the morning with a dinner pail and with tools in his hand. Let him imagine himself living in the house which this man lives in, receiving his wages and eating his food. On the other hand, let the workingman put himself in the employer's place and ask himself how he would solve the problems of a great industrial organization. Let the mistress change places with her maid in the kitchen; ask herself how she would like to live in the room she gives the girl and receive her wages and live in her environment; and on the other hand let the girl imagine herself taking care of the family with all the responsibility of little children and the care of the house. It is because people do not have "sharing-imaginations" that very often injustice and wrong and bitterness exist which shut out the beneficial effects of the abundant life which Jesus came to give.

5. Jesus would mean by the abundant life absence of the burden of sin. There can be no abundant life to those who are living lives of disobedience to God. As the prophet says of the wicked, "The wicked are like the troubled sea, whose waters cast up mire and dirt. There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." An individual who has no peace does not have abundant life. Jesus came to take away the sin of the world, and in taking it away he makes room for the coming in of an opportunity, and the abundant life at once begins in a redeemed soul. It is literally true that the most ignorant person who is fully redeemed and is conscious of that fact has a far more abundant life in a real grasp of real life than the most highly educated person who is living a life apart from God.

6. Jesus meant by the abundant life spiritual exaltation. Material, physical things alone do not mean abundant life. A man with a full dinner pail and an empty soul does not have abundant life. We may stuff our houses full of the most expensive things, line our bookshelves with tokens of our culture and high education, dress in the most expensive clothing, carry the largest possible bank account and eat the most expensive food, and still be as far from the abundant life as the most degraded savage. Jesus himself said, "A man's life does not consist in the abundance of the things which he possesses," and the word which he used there meant "superfluity" of things he possesses; and he also said once, "Man shall not live by bread alone." There is no such thing as a gospel applied to the social needs of man which satisfies simply his stomach or his back. A full gospel must always include spiritual exercise —a vision of God. Legislation which simply looks after bread and butter and helps man's physical life and nothing more, will not bring in the millennium. The world is already suffering from men who have all that their bodies could wish. More harm is being done to civilization to-day by the very rich than by the very poor. Men need bread for their bodies, but no less do they need the bread of life for their souls, and it is only when the two go together that men really have abundant life. This is the teaching of the Master.

A Future World

7. By abundant life Jesus meant also a vivid consciousness of a future world. This is as necessary as food or shelter or education. The abundant life must take account and does take account of all life—not simply that which we see and feel in the body, but the life which will continue forever, and no soul of man can be conscious of a full life who does not take into account what we call the world to come. It was this vivid consciousness of another life after this which made possible the early martyrdoms of the church and the heroic courage and joyful faith of those who made the very beginning of social Christianity.

To sum up, by the "abundant life" Jesus meant freedom of opportunity in the right to be well born; freedom from fear and its paralyzing effects; opportunities to enrich life with its common sources of enjoyment; sharing life with the great multitude; freedom from the great burden of sin; spiritual exaltation and exercise; and a vivid consciousness of the future world.

Is Jesus giving to the world this abundant life which he said he came to give? Christianity must stand by the test which Jesus himself gave—that is, by its fruits. After all these years of Christianity, what are the fruits of Jesus' teaching? It is safe to say that there is no power known to mankind which has been able to realize so much of the things we have mentioned as the faith of Christ. Already we are beginning to see in the turning of the heathen peoples to Christ something of the wonderful power of Christianity. The religious census which has recently been finished covering the last ten years in India shows that Christians have increased by nearly a million, or from 2,923,000 in 1901 to 3,870,000 in 1911.

The facts which are found in the development of Christian peoples must be the basis for the abundant life as Jesus proclaimed it, and it is true to-day that among Christian peoples there is a greater freedom of opportunity for being born rightly, more social justice, more widespread righteousness, cleaner homes, better schools, wider output of energy than among peoples of any other religious faith. The triumph of Christianity will be seen in its final development of mankind. The net results of the best that a human being can become will inevitably follow along the lines of Jesus' teaching. It is literally true that he is drawing all men up unto himself, and historically true that the world is turning more and more to him, as "the way, the truth and the life."

O WINDS! O WAVES!

OH, MANY are the sailors brave
Who sail the ocean o'er,
Who mingle with the crested wave
Their songs from shore to shore!
Their arms are strong, their eyes are clear,
Their hearts are bold and free.
Oh, many lads to some one dear
Sail far upon the sea!
O winds, O waves, be kind to-day!
Float gently o'er the sea!
Bring home somehow, somewhere, some day,
My sailor boy to me!

Oh, many are the sailors true
Who silent watches keep!
Far down beneath the billows blue
They sleep their last, long sleep.
Each white-cap is a marble stone,
Each billow marks a grave;
But He who walked the sea alone
Can walk beneath the wave.
O winds, O waves, be kind to-day!
Float gently o'er the sea!
Bring home somehow, somewhere, some day,
My sailor boy to me!

Thou unseen Pilot of the sea,
Whose hand each vessel guides,
Whose word through all eternity
Moves waves and winds and tides,
Bring home, when storms shall be no more,
From off life's restless sea
The sailors to the golden shore—
And one poor lad to me!
O winds, O waves, be kind to-day!
Float gently o'er the sea!
Bring home somehow, somewhere, some day,
My sailor boy to me!

Art Wins the Heart

(See Cover)

OUR cover this week is a reproduction of the famous painting, "Kunst bringt Gunst" ("art wins favor," or, as the words are more freely translated, "art wins the heart"), by Paul Thumann, the famous genre painter and illustrator, widely celebrated for his portrayal of scenes in the life of Luther.

Though the charming picture on the cover is not one of Herr Thumann's most celebrated pictures from the viewpoint of the critic of art's mechanical side, it is one of his most widely known canvases. It is a delightfully human picture. Its handsome artist and his amphora of a bygone era and its absorbed maiden watcher have not only the appeal of their beauty but the added fascination that all the world feels in watching the craftsman at his handiwork. Then, too, there's just the suggestion of a story. Just the same old story that has made all ages one.

Herr Thumann, the artist, was born at Tschacksdorf, Lusatia, October 5, 1834, and was successively professor of art at Weimar, Dresden, and Berlin.

The Italics of Life

By Eugene Thwing

DOCTORS of style in the writing of English declare that the use of italics for emphasis is a positive fault showing weakness of construction and inability to express ideas strongly by a right arrangement of words. Nevertheless, italics are used deliberately by some forceful writers to gain added effect and to fasten the eye and the mind of the reader upon important points, somewhat as a speaker will strengthen his oration by vocal emphasis and gesture. Whatever may be said for or against the use of italics, they certainly reveal the writer's sense of relative importance in the things he has written. He has selected certain words and phrases and has given them special prominence. As we note their significance we begin to know more of the man behind the words. His choice of emphasis tells us what manner of man he is. His italics are an index of his mental or moral character.

We are all writing history day by day. On every page some things are written small, others stand out boldly in italics. Take up the book at night and read the story of the day. It will be an interesting record—perhaps a startling one. Doubtless we shall feel very much like correcting the proof when we find where the italics are set.

NOT long ago a woman in Massachusetts died, leaving in her will $100,000 to her dear old horse that he might be cared for in luxury as long as he lived. "A charming act of kindness in providing for a faithful dumb animal," commented one newspaper, adding, "a rich old horse, a pensioned old horse, an endowed old horse, a horse 'well fixed' on a hundred thousand dollars. Good for him."

Yes, every lover of animals feels his heart warm at an act of tenderness to any helpless animal. Unfortunately we cannot think of any one thing apart from other things. Comparison and contrast are the only means of measurement—the only way to judge emphasis. Christ himself said that not even a sparrow should "fall on the ground without your Father," but he added quickly, "ye are of more value than many sparrows." If the kind-hearted woman in Massachusetts had left a hundred million dollars to care for the dear helpless children and the sick hopeless mothers who are of more value than many horses, we should not feel that she had such a wrong sense of proportion. We find no reference to such provision in her will. She wrote her love and tenderness for a horse in italics, just as many another of us is wont to do. I have known a sister to express her fondness for animals in italics, and capitals, and big bold type with plentiful exclamation points, while a younger sister has been dismissed with the smallest, faintest letters to indicate any sisterly affection or tenderness. Why is it that so often the italics of love are lavished upon outside friends and interests rather than upon the ones at home?

ANNIVERSARIES are among the italics of life. The great national holidays which celebrate important events in the country's history; the church holy days, perpetuating the sacred memories dear to the Christian; the birthdays and wedding days which mark the passing years by means of the brightest milestones—all these stand out as italics in the page of history. A man living in Georgia wrote an event in italics the other day when he sent invitations near and far to friends and relatives asking them to come and help him "to celebrate the one hundredth birthday of two bottles of brandy."

How strange the daily page we write in the home, in the church, in business must look sometimes to the Father who sees our writing when the day is done! How strange it would look to us if we could review it frankly! The whole complexion of our life depends upon where we put the emphasis. Many a business man has failed because he put too much time and money and energy into the things that didn't count. Fine office equipment and elegant stationery have ruined countless concerns. One of the most prosperous newspapers, financially, in New York City is edited and published in dingy, cramped quarters scattered in several buildings. The emphasis has always been placed upon the producing work rather than the style and show.

Many a busy housewife has come to the end of a day "tired to death" not by the real work she has done but by the misplaced emphasis upon things of small importance. When the nerves are strained and irritated by constant fret and worry over the little mistakes, the little hindrances, and the little details of the day's work all the strength melts away and life becomes a burden. Why do we italicize so many of our little pains and troubles and pass over almost unnoticed the great blessings?

EVERY earnest Christian must needs decide where he shall place the emphasis in matters of duty and matters of pleasure. Recently the Methodist General Conference discussed the rules of the Discipline which forbid certain forms of amusement. The report of the Board of Bishops advised the discontinuance of these rules, not because the specific kinds of amusement are approved, but because the rules are found to place the emphasis where it does not belong—on the form rather than on the substance. Too long have externals been given prominence and genuine heart experience slighted.

"And the Lord said unto him, Now do ye Pharisees make clean the outside of the cup and the platter; but your inward part is full of ravening and wickedness.

"Ye tithe mint and rue and all manner of herbs, and pass over judgment and the love of God; these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone."

A good exercise for the quiet evening hour after a day full of work, or full of play, or even full of religious activity would be to take our blue pencil and go over the record we have made, examining it closely, marking out the foolish italics in many places and underscoring some neglected passages, until we have a better model for the day to come, a model that we shall not be ashamed to submit to the great Editor who reviews all the manuscripts of life and sees every expression of our real self in its true proportion.

FOR STRENGTH WE ASK

FOR strength we ask
For the ten thousand times repeated task,
The endless smallnesses of every day;

No, not to lay
My life down in the cause I cherish most;
That were too easy; but, whate'er it cost,

To fail no more
In gentleness toward the ungentle, nor
In love toward the unlovely, and to give,

Each day I live,
To every hour with outstretched hand its meed
Of not-to-be regretted thought or deed.

Triumphs of the Cross

KNOWING that so many of your readers are interested in the work of my father ("Gipsy Smith") I thought they would like to know something of his work this last winter on the Pacific Coast. My father started his first mission in the city of Spokane, Wash., in the month of October, 1911. His meetings were held in a large tent with a seating capacity of 6,000, which was crowded at every service. Following this he went to Seattle, where the meetings were held in a rink, seating 5,000 people. From there he went to Portland, Ore., where the local committee erected a tabernacle to accommodate 6,000 persons. After that he went to Tacoma, Wash., and a tabernacle was also built in this town to accommodate 5,000 persons; then to San Francisco, where the meetings were held in a large rink, seating about 7,000 persons. This was the first united evangelistic effort made in San Francisco in twenty-five years. Los Angeles was next, where the meetings were held in the Shrine Auditorium, a splendid building capable of holding 6,000, and the noon meetings were held in the Temple Auditorium, which held 3,500. The last place was Dallas, Tex., where the meetings were held in the large Coliseum on the Fair Ground, two miles from the city.

Let me tell you of one or two remarkable cases of conversion that my father was privileged to see during this trip. A man who was converted in Los Angeles had years ago committed a bank robbery for which another man had been sentenced, and rather than suffer innocently had committed suicide. After this man's conversion he went back to the town where the case had been tried and stated his case, and asked the court to reopen trial, as he was willing to suffer for his crime. The court found that so many years had elapsed since the robbery was committed that they could not, according to the laws of the State, punish him; so he was allowed to go free. The man felt that he could not do anything less than consecrate his life to Jesus Christ. He gave up his business, and has devoted his life to preaching to the prisoners on the Pacific Coast.

Another case, that of a drummer in San Francisco, who became converted, and on returning to his home town and telling his pastor, was invited to tell of his conversion at the Sunday night service. Several people were converted as a result, and the drummer is now preparing to devote his life to rescue mission work in one of the towns in the Middle West. One night in Portland my father was preaching on "Stripe Washing," when a man got up near the front and was making his way across the building when my father said, "Where are you going?" The man said, "There is a man over there that I robbed some years ago, and I want to begin my 'stripe washing' by giving him this $20 and I will give him the rest when I have earned it."

The tour lasted five months and two weeks, and during that time my father preached over four hundred sermons to an aggregate of 1,250,000 people, and saw from thirty to forty thousand nearer the Cross.

ALBANY R. SMITH.

DR. KLOPSCH HONORED BY JAPAN

Baron Takewo Ozawa

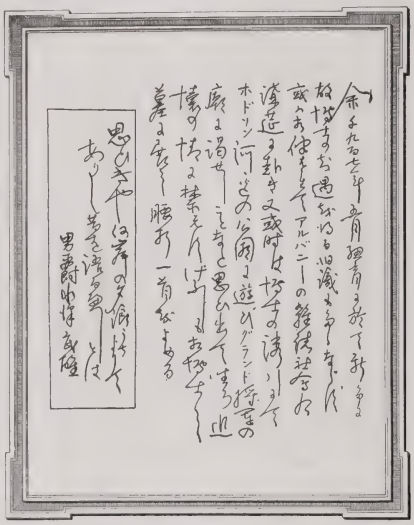
DURING the famine in Japan in the winter of 1906-07, the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, with the aid of his subscribers, conducted a very important relief work in that country. He succeeded in raising a large fund through the columns of this paper, which was the means of saving a multitude of lives in the northeast provinces of Japan, where the famine did its devastating work. The value of his services was officially recognized by the Japanese Government, and Baron Takewo Ozawa was commissioned by the Emperor and Empress to convey to Dr. Klopsch the royal acknowledgments of all the kindness and generous aid which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD itself and its readers had extended to the people of Japan. On May 15, 1907, the Baron, accompanied by his secretary and interpreter, Mr. Masatake S. Togo, a relative of the great Admiral Togo, the naval hero of Japan, visited THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices in the Bible House, New York, and invested Dr. Klopsch with the decoration of the Rising Sun. This is an order which holds the same place in Japan that the various orders of knighthood hold in European countries. It is worn on the left breast on occasions of ceremony. This testimonial of the friendship and gratitude of Japan was greatly valued by Dr. Klopsch, who regarded it as a significant recognition of the great life-saving Christian work in which our readers had generously united in relieving the distressed in the Mikado's empire.

On Wednesday, May 1, 1912, Baron Ozawa and Secretary Togo again visited the offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. After greeting its editors cordially and recalling the incidents of his former visit, the distinguished Baron—who is a member of the modern House of Peers of Japan and also the official head of the Royal Japanese Red Cross Society—explained that he came on a mission of sentiment and duty. He desired the privilege of visiting the tomb of Dr. Klopsch and of laying a wreath upon his grave. The next day, May 2, the Baron, together with Secretary Togo, was accompanied to Sleepy Hollow Cemetery at Tarrytown-on-Hudson, Mrs. Klopsch and Mr. Otto Koenig, president of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, being also of the party.

On arriving at the cemetery, the quartet proceeded to the plot where lie the remains of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S late editor. Baron Ozawa approached the grave, uncovered his head and bowed deeply and ceremoniously. Secretary Togo handed him a magnificent wreath of beautiful flowers, which the aged Baron deposited tenderly on the grave. He then stood facing the little group and made a brief address, speaking in his own native tongue with great dignity and feeling. Translated by Secretary Togo afterward, the Baron's remarks were as follows:

"I well remember that it was in May, 1907, five years ago, that I first met the late distinguished American editor and philanthropist, Dr. Louis Klopsch. Having heard much of his generous benevolences, I had already learned to look upon him as a friend of long acquaintance. He received me with charming hospitality, and during my stay in New York I was his guest. He took me to the distinguished gathering of Periodical Publishers, held in Albany; to the tomb of the great American, General Grant, on the banks of the Hudson, and to other places of interest. Coming to New York again this time, I cannot forbear the recalling of those events which then gave me so much pleasure. Now, however, on my present visit I am overcome by a feeling of sorrow for my lost friend, and I cannot avoid expressing my thought in this little verse, which has sprung from my depressed heart:

"Alas! I had not thought
I would listen in the twilight
To the murmurs of the river,
Lamenting the days that have been."



The Original of Baron Ozawa's Address in Japanese

Secretary Masatake S. Togo

Having spoken thus, the Baron again gravely bowed toward the grave of his friend, and then slowly stepped aside. Tears stood in the eyes of those who listened, for they felt that his sorrow and appreciation were sincere.

Secretary Togo then stood before the grave, in the same position the Baron had occupied. Twice he made profound obeisance, speaking no word. He then retired. The ceremony was finished.

Baron Ozawa is a fine type of the old nobility of Japan. He is of the famous samurai class, a peer by long inheritance, and a member of the Imperial Parliament. In his sixty-eighth year, he is still active and physically capable of executing the various important duties of his high office. He has been a leading figure in the military development of Japan, having occupied high administrative positions in the army, and later being president of the Royal Military Academy, vice-minister of the army, vice-chief of staff and more recently the practical head of the Red Cross. The Baron is a warm friend of the United States and a strong believer in the continuance of friendly relations between the two countries. On his former visit he paid a tribute of honor and respect to the late General Grant, laying a wreath of flowers upon the tomb of that great American soldier at the mausoleum in Riverside Park. Dr. Klopsch was his companion on that occasion.

The Baron will remain only a short time in the United States before returning to Japan.

IS IT THE OLDEST BIBLE?

CONSIDERABLE interest has been awakened among Orientalists and Biblical scholars generally by reason of the discovery announced from Egypt of an ancient Coptic papyrus manuscript which some distinguished investigators are said to have pronounced the oldest Bible manuscript in existence. This interesting "find" is said to include the text of the greater part of the Book of Deuteronomy, the whole of Jonah and the major portion of the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles. Discussing the discovery, the London Times concludes that the new codex proves beyond all question that copies of an Egyptian or Coptic translation of some of the books of the New Testament were in circulation in the early part of the fourth century, and it deduces from the evidence that the version just found belongs to the third century and that the early Christians may have learned to repeat the Psalms and other books of the Bible in Coptic instead of Greek. The Times compares the "find" with the Codex Vaticanus in antiquity and value. The Acts, although written in a good hand, is evidently a copy from an earlier document, since it contains many palpable errors which could only be made by a careless copyist from an old or partly obliterated text. Words and even lines are omitted.

It will indeed be a remarkable discovery if the manuscript just brought to light should prove to be older than any now known. The Codex Sinaiticus is believed to be of the fourth century; the Alexandrinus of the fifth century, the Vaticanus of the fourth and the Ephraemi of the fifth. Eusebius is authority for the statement that Mark the evangelist was sent to Egypt to establish the first churches in Alexandria. This must have been while he was still a young man, probably under forty. There are many references extant touching his work in Egypt. He began his work there about A.D. 62-63, and his propaganda spread over a large part of Egypt. The Alexandrian churches early began to use the liturgy of Mark. In 235 A.D. there were twenty Egyptian bishoprics, and the canon of the Alexandrian Version was then well defined. Nothing could be more natural than that portions of Scripture would be in circulation for private use in the Coptic as well as in the Greek. Mark's mother was a Greek, and her house in Jerusalem was a center of spiritual resort for the brethren; and it is a reasonable conclusion that Mark himself, being familiar with that language, would have provided translations for his Egyptian disciples. Altogether, Mark's missionary work in Alexandria may not have occupied more than ten or twelve years; but in that time, as the internal evidence shows, it must have been far-reaching and successful.

The London Times seems to connect St. Anthony with the production or circulation of these early Scriptures, but the relation is extremely doubtful. Anthony was born in Coma in Egypt A.D. 251, nearly a century after Mark's work had been firmly established and its founder had passed away. Anthony may have read "the Scriptures in his own tongue," however, as Theodoret has declared, but in view of Mark's mission, the Copts could not have been a century without the New Testament Scriptures.

The new "find," which must henceforth be called the Coptic Codex, contains 109 papyrus leaves, about 11x6 inches. Some twenty leaves are supposed to be missing. It is worm-eaten and much worn and has evidently been greatly used by its owner. It bears the title "Coptic Biblical Texts" in the dialect of Upper Egypt. Some of the writing is exceedingly faint and it has been retouched in places; moreover, while the Coptic is used throughout, the writing in several places is cursive Greek.

WOMAN SUFFRAGISTS ON PARADE

Part of the Parade Passing Madison Square | The Marchers in Fifty-seventh Street | Crowds Watching the Parade at the Public Library

IT WAS an army ten thousand strong that made up the great second annual parade of the Woman Suffragist Party and its sympathizers in New York on May 4. New York had never before seen a parade quite like this, and an immense crowd had come out to stand upon the sidewalks and cheer or jeer as it felt inclined. The line of march of the parade was from Washington Arch, at the lower end, up Fifth Avenue to Fifty-seventh Street, and through to Carnegie Hall. In comparison with last year's parade this year's performance was a great surprise to the spectators. Last year a little band of courageous women braved the curiosity and jibes of their fellow citizens and marched rather lonesomely down Fifth Avenue. There were less than four thousand of them, and a thin line of the curious stood on the curbs to watch them as they passed.

This year's parade was a very different affair. The head of the column was just turning into Fifty-seventh Street when the final group of marchers fell into line to begin their march at Washington Square. And this year the crowds packed the sidewalks along the entire line of march and in many places overflowed into the roadways, where the police had all they could do to keep sufficient room for the paraders to march through. It was an orderly crowd, too; there was some cheering, but not much, and some applause, mostly for women whose activities have made them national figures. There was little jibing or jeering, for the parade did not inspire that type of "humor." The men who marched came in for the most of the caustic comments that were heard.

At the head of the parade, following the escort of mounted police, rode a group of between sixty and seventy mounted suffragists. Miss Inez Mulholland, Miss Gertrude Elliott and Miss Alberta Hill were conspicuous figures of this feminine cavalry and won from an interested youth the remark: "They could get off their horses and get married anywhere along the line." After them followed the college women in their caps and gowns. Although there were many famous women in this group, Dr. Anna Howard Shaw attracted the most attention and received the most applause. Here and there the brilliant hoods and gowns of the Masters of Arts and Doctors of Philosophy and Science made splashes of brilliant color. It was a parade of contrasts, for in it there were women of almost every occupation and profession; women of advanced years who rode in carriages, and so down through all the ages of womanhood and girlhood to one enthusiastic suffragist who was pushed in a perambulator. The college women were followed by long lines in which were represented mothers and housekeepers, nurses, teachers, cooks, writers, social workers, librarians, milliners, dressmakers, lawyers, artists, doctors, architects, sculptors, actresses, schoolgirls and laundry workers. The women who have made their names famous in the last generation of suffragists were not forgotten, for all the way up and down the parade were seen banners bearing the names of Julia Ward Howe, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony and many others. The oldest of the living suffragists rode in carriages, and one of the most conspicuous among them was the Rev. Antoinette Brown Blackwell.

Besides New York State there were a number of the divisions of the parade which represented the various States of the Union as well as a number of foreign countries. Distant Australia, where women already have the franchise, was represented by a tall handsome woman who bore the Australian flag and headed the delegations from other lands. Norway and Sweden were represented by their national flags in the hands of groups of fair-haired women, who lent an interest and added color to the parade by wearing their national costumes. Finland, too, was represented by some of her daughters in national dress. Italy and Greece were both represented, and though the French flag nowhere appeared in the parade, a number of New York's best-known Frenchwomen were marching under other flags.

The groups of marchers carried banners bearing in large and small letters suffrage sentiments, some of which were rather pertinent. "We prepare children for the world. We ask to prepare the world for our children." "More ballots, less bullets." "A people learns to vote by voting." "The feeders of the world want votes to lower the cost of food." Mrs. Loo Lin, a Chinese lady, was mounted, and bore a banner which read, "Women vote in China. Why not here?" Dr. Shaw carried a little banner which she displayed with evident enjoyment, and which caused a ripple of amusement all along the line. It bore the legend, "Catching up with China."

The men's division of the parade caused, perhaps, the greatest excitement of all. The men represented as many walks in life and as many classes of society as the women. There were old gray-haired men in frock coats and tiles, who lifted their hats with the air of an almost by-gone school. There were young men in perfect afternoon attire, there were clerks and artisans and teamsters and laborers. The group was not without its men whose names rank big in their various walks of life. There were such men as Prof. John Dewey of Columbia, Hamilton Holt, Oswald Garrison Villard, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, James H. Laidlaw, Prof. E. J. Spingarn, Prof. James H. Robinson, Montague Glass, Duncan B. Harrison and Richard Le Gallienne.

There was no great volume of sound at any point of the march; no great organized banks of cheering. It was a quiet crowd that watched, although there must have been four thousand spectators at the Public Library. One woman voiced a protest at the comparative silence of the crowds. She was standing in front of one of the Fifth Avenue clubs, and observed with resentment that the men quietly watching from the windows gave no signs of encouragement.

"The idea!" she remarked sharply. "Why don't they lean out and cheer? If they were out here marching and we were in there watching they would expect us to cheer our heads off."

"Madam," said a venerable man standing next to her, as he doffed his high hat, "Madam, they cannot be expected to cheer. They are very, very busy thinking. Your parade is making the men think."

The bands were arranged with a good deal of foresight at excellent distances along the line of the parade, and with very few dropping out along the route, the women marched in a truly soldierly fashion up the Avenue. When the Socialists, both men and women, who formed the last contingent of the marchers, had reached Carnegie Hall, illuminating their now darkening route with the flare of red torches, a great meeting was held for the encouragement of the suffragists for another year of the propagation of their ideas.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—EX-EMPRESS EUGENIE, the widow of Napoleon III., has just passed her eighty-sixth birthday. She attributes her health and vigor to her daily walk of two miles, which she takes regularly, no matter what the weather. She is very active and keeps in touch with the affairs of the world and the best of literature.

—THE TRIAL OF THE steel magnates has begun in New York and testimony is now being taken in the government's action for the dissolution of the United States Steel Corporation. Several witnesses testified regarding the alleged pool on horseshoes, and the barbed-wire pool was also under discussion. The investigation will probably be a prolonged one.

—THE WILL OF John Jacob Astor, who perished on the Titanic, leaves an estate estimated at $100,000,000, the residuary legatee being William Vincent Astor, aged seventeen. The widow, Madeline Force Astor, receives $100,000 in cash, besides an income from a trust fund of $5,000,000 and the life use of the Astor mansion in New York. The first wife, MRS. Ava Willing Astor, is not mentioned in the will, but her daughter, Ava Alice Muriel Astor, was provided for some time ago by a trust fund of $5,000,000, which she receives in full at majority.

—THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES has passed a bill providing for the coinage of a three-cent piece and a half-cent piece for current circulation. This bill is in response to a demand from cities which have a three-cent fare on street cars, and in order that the public may have the use of as many denominations of small coins as are needed for business convenience. It has also been urged that the new coinage will encourage economic buying through the means of making smaller change than at present.

—ACCORDING TO SENOR MANUEL LUJAN, special envoy to the United States from Orozco, the revolutionary leader in Mexico, the fires of strife in that unfortunate country, instead of waning, as the new Mexican ambassador to Washington, Senor Calero, would have us believe, are still burning with intensity and spreading. Lujan declares that twenty out of the twenty-seven States are taking an active part in the uprising; he positively denies that the revolutionists are in any way hostile to the American residents of the country and asserts that the pillage and looting we hear so much about have been perpetrated by federal troops and not by the rebel forces, Orozco in the beginning ordering all looters to be shot immediately on detection. All classes, rich and poor, he added, were behind the rebel movement in the greater part of the country. The United States transport Buford, under orders, sailed out of San Francisco Harbor on April 28 as a relief ship for the aid of some Americans in distress on the west coast of that country. The greatest secrecy was maintained about the despatching of the Buford, which was only thought to carry doctors and nurses, but had on board forty armed enlisted men. It is possible that either the Mexican Government or the rebel forces of Orozco may misinterpret their presence and resent it in a very disagreeable way.

—LATE IN APRIL the death of Stephen S. Haight, of New York, took place at St. Luke's Hospital. The old man went to sleep literally worn out in the service of humanity. Mr. Haight was a Quaker, with all the characteristics of the sect, but his love was broader than any church and all creeds were alike to him so long as there was a need present. He was a constant visitor to the missions, usually attending several each evening, ending at the midnight and all night missions in Chinatown. At each, if given an opportunity to speak, he would deliver a short and direct appeal to men and women to lead better lives. Some thought the old man a trifle queer in his ways, but the Bowery knew it was because he was thinking of others, not himself, and they loved him for his peculiarities. Probably no missionary—he worked without salary, and supported himself—was so well known among workers in the missions. His work was evident, but his antecedents and his life were unknown. He had no intimates. No one ever saw him accept money from the charitably inclined, and the source of his constant stream of benefactions was a mystery. The Bowery—missionary and unfortunate alike—will remember the kindly old man for a long time and will miss the cheer of his presence.

Help the Flood Sufferers

WHAT is beyond doubt the worst flood disaster this generation has ever known is now visiting the Mississippi Valley. Thousands of square miles of fertile territory are under water. Cities, towns and villages, plantations and big and little farms are literally being "drowned out" by the inundation. Thousands of men are risking their lives strengthening the levees of the great river, which has overflowed its banks at many places and transformed into an inland sea a territory almost as large as the State of New York. At one point alone—the Torras break—sixty lives are reported to have been lost, with the prospect of hundreds more perishing at the same place. Motor-boats are doing relief work up and down the inundated parishes, but as such boats are comparatively few, the ominous outlook is that thousands, who are now completely surrounded, must be swept to death unless help is speedily sent. At Morganza, a great many are marooned with no chance of escape unless rescue boats arrive in time. New Orleans is fighting a battle for life, and Baton Rouge is doing the same. All up and down the river a similar struggle is in progress. Refugees, who have lost their homes and all their possessions, are being cared for in relief camps—an army of destitute men, women and little children.

It is a visitation on a scale so vast that it can hardly be exaggerated. While we cannot call back the lives that have already been sacrificed, nor restore the homes that have been destroyed by the flood, we can at least help the destitute sufferers with food and clothing. To this Christlike work THE CHRISTIAN HERALD invites its readers as a duty and a privilege. Let it not be said that those who have done so nobly in relief work in Russia, China, India, Japan, Finland, Italy, Cuba and Armenia, neglected the call of suffering at our own doors, from those who are our brothers and sisters, our blood and kindred.

This is an opportunity for Christian service not to be turned aside. Send in your gifts to-day and have a share in this life-saving and humanitarian work in the stricken Mississippi Valley. Address all communications to Every gift will be duly acknowledged, and may God add his richest blessing to the work, and make it a means of saving precious lives and alleviating suffering.

What Is Faith?

WHILE theoretically the Protestant churches hold positively that we are saved by faith, it is to be feared that the majority of Protestant church members fail to realize actually that this is true. Stranger still, while faith is recognized as the real basis of salvation, many Christians have at best a very vague idea of what faith really is. What is faith? What is this priceless currency by which eternal life is secured? Can faith be defined?

The clearest idea of faith may be obtained by contrasting it with knowledge. Certain things we know. It is an interesting experiment to ask oneself how many things one is really sure of, and how that assurance has come to the consciousness. Many of the things we suppose ourselves to be sure about we should have to admit were after all uncertainties. Real knowledge comes to the mind in a comparatively limited number of ways. But few as they are and limited as the methods of receiving the assurances may be, there are some things we know.

Now, faith deals with matters which, without it, cannot be known. Suppose a thing we know to be marked 100; that is, there are one hundred degrees of certainty about it. There can be no faith about that; every degree is filled up with positive assurance. But here is another thing of which we are inclined to believe, let us say, 50 per cent., and to doubt 50 per cent.—something in which we cannot, by any ordinary means of knowledge, attain 100 per cent. certainty. In a matter of this sort the will can enter and turn the scale. We may exercise "the will to believe," in the words which Professor James made the title of his great book.

Now comes the miracle. As we put forth the will to believe, faith may pass over into certainty. It is something like the experience of the airmen. As they give themselves to the air and keep moving, they find that it holds them up. In other words, faith works; it is a success. And to established Christians, faith in Jesus comes to be, not like being supported in mid-air, but like standing on a rock. They come to be surer of Christ than of anything else in the world. Their knowledge of him may come to be almost the only thing in which they have literally 100 per cent. certainty.

The soul must take at the beginning that risk of faith. It must venture. The man is not sure; and he cannot get the assurance till he trusts. But when he trusts, the assurance comes, and as he continues to trust the assurance grows. In this way faith is like what the scientists and logicians call a hypothesis—something which must be assumed at the beginning before any headway of proof can be made. Some of the most important of the accepted truths of science are reached in this way. The theory is taken for granted at the beginning; observations are made on the basis of the theory. Then the observations absolutely demonstrate the theory, and what was an assumed hypothesis becomes positive knowledge. So does our trust become assurance.

"This is the victory that overcometh the world, even your faith." There are thrills of power, as well as thrills of pleasure all along the way. And although there may be something that seems like risk at the beginning of the way of faith, there is no risk at its end. "A cloud of witnesses" testify to this. It leads straight, and plain, and sure to the "abundant entrance," to the undimmed vision of the Saviour, to the glad welcome of that numberless company who have "walked by faith," who have "kept the faith," who have "died in the faith."

An Impressive Parade

ORDER, enthusiasm and dignity marked the parade of the woman suffragists in New York on May 4, when ten thousand representatives of the sex united in a public demonstration in behalf of equal suffrage. It was a unique and impressive spectacle and evoked no little enthusiasm. In the long line were women of all classes, but all on an equal footing: the rich and influential, the brain-workers and those who work with their hands. It was representative in the sense that in the ranks were to be found many women of culture and high intelligence, and the pageant afforded a pleasing contrast to the violent demonstrations in other lands which have been a serious setback to the movement. But these New York women were too much in earnest to indulge in fantastic tricks and ridiculous outbreaks. There was something pathetic about the long line of eager faces, some aged, but many of them youthful. No one would say that they were not sincere in the belief that the cause in which they had embarked would benefit, not themselves alone, but their husbands, their brothers and the whole nation. It was a demonstration which, though it may not have made converts of the onlookers, at least has won for the marching women increased respect, and it gives assurance of a more generous hearing for their cause in days to come.

Romanist Aggression Rebuked

AT THE General Methodist Conference held in Minneapolis, Minn., the following resolutions, reported by the Committee on Missions to Catholic Countries, were adopted on May 10, by a rising vote, none dissenting:

Whereas, The limitations imposed on the recent World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh set aside all Protestant missionary work in Greek and Roman Catholic countries, which action saddened and outraged our growing native churches;

Whereas, Methodism, since its birth in a protest against dead formalism and ceremonial, has ever stood for aggressive evangelism in all lands, and the Methodist Episcopal Church has been for more than seventy-five years actively engaged in work in those lands where Greek or Roman Catholicism predominates; and

Whereas, In all those lands, which form a large part of the missionary field of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the teachings and practices of Romanism deprive the people of the Bible, pervert many of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and foster superstitions which alienate the thinking classes and bind heavy burdens upon the poor; therefore be it

Resolved, That the Methodist Episcopal Church recognizes its plain duty to prosecute its missionary enterprises in Greek and Roman Catholic countries with increasing zeal; and be it

Resolved, That we will most vigorously protest against any future exclusion of missions in Greek or Roman Catholic countries from ecumenical or other similar missionary gatherings; and be it

Resolved, That it is our duty to oppose the machinations of Romanism, and to counteract its attempts to gain an ever increasing control of our public schools, or to use the public funds for sectarian schools; and finally be it

Resolved, That we feel the deepest sympathy with as well as love toward the priests and people within the Greek and Roman Catholic churches who are working toward a more spiritual interpretation of the Christian faith.

Model Markets in the West

WE GIVE space in this issue to letters from a number of our readers on the open market question. It is agreeable to note that there are several of the best type already in operation in a number of cities. Dubuque, Ia., is a case in point. Its people are fortunate in having several excellent markets, which supply a variety of commodities direct from producer to consumer, at prices that materially assist in reducing the cost of living in that city. Those municipalities that have not yet gone into the experiment would do well to follow the example of this progressive Western city, which has done so much for its population toward solving the problem that confronts householders everywhere.

Rodin's Bust, La France

THE people of France have given another expression of the love that exists between the sister republics in the presentation of a bust of "La France" by M. Auguste Rodin, which is to be placed at the foot of the Champlain Memorial Lighthouse at Crown Point, Lake Champlain. M. Gabriel Hanotaux, a member of the French Academy and former Foreign Minister of France, came over with the gift. The following notable people accompanied him: Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, the great French advocate of peace; M. Blériot, the aviator; the Comte and Comtesse de Rochambeau, Vidal de Lablache, member of the French Institute; M. Girard and Mlle. Girard, Leon Barthou, president of the Aero Club of France; Louis Barthou, the Duke de Choiseul, M. Dal Piaz, Gaston Deschamps, Gabriel Louis Jaray, the Vicomte de Chambrun, Réné Bazin, Etienne Lamy, General Lebon, grand officer of the Legion of Honor; Fernand Cormon, president of the Academy of Fine Arts, and his daughter, Mlle. Cormon. The official party was received in New York and dined at the White House, and met with becoming attention. The unveiling of the bronze bust occurred with appropriate exercises at Crown Point, N. Y. Senator Knapp presided, and addresses on behalf of the United States were made by Governor Mead of Vermont and Acting Governor Conway of New York. M. Gabriel Hanotaux made the principal address of the day. The bust was placed in the wall of the Champlain Memorial Lighthouse, which is in course of erection, and which is to be completed during the present summer. The celebration marking this unveiling was one of a series in the United States and Canada in the last five years, commemorative of the discoveries of one of France's most distinguished voyagers three hundred years ago. How beautiful the fraternity between the two republics! Of nations can be said what the Psalmist said of individuals:

Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity. (Ps. 133: 1.)

The Kaiser's Tribute

IN CONNECTION with the twenty-third anniversary of Professor Koch's announcement of the discovery of the tuberculosis bacillus, Emperor William ordered the Royal Institute for the Study of Infectious Diseases in Berlin, in which Professor Koch worked for twenty years, to bear Koch's name. In his decree the emperor says, "Professor Koch, by his discovery, opened the combat against the greatest scourge of mankind, which has since been conducted with unprecedented success, and has made suffering humanity his eternal debtor." What marvelous scientific discoveries have been made by which the germs of so many fatal diseases have been found and specific enemies to kill them! Much of truth as the Kaiser's tribute contains, in referring to the great progress made recently in the war on consumption, the fact remains that as yet no certain cure for that specific germ has as yet been discovered. It looks as though it might be in the near future. As yet nutriment and fresh air are the greatest enemies of the greatest foe of the health of the race. The Kaiser justly perpetuates the name of this scientist and philanthropist. There is a Physician and Philanthropist whose name stands above all others, the one

Far above all principality and power, and might and dominion, and every name that is named. (Eph. 1: 21.)

Travesty on a Sacred Event

UPON a lofty stage, erected in the center of St. Isaac's Cathedral, the Metropolitan of St. Petersburg performed the picturesque ceremony of washing the feet of twelve persons before an enormous congregation. At the end of the liturgy the great doors of gold which cut off the chancel from the nave slowly opened and the metropolitan, clothed in cloth of silver, shot with blue, came slowly from the sanctuary. He ascended the dais, took off his miter, sparkling with precious stones, laid aside his splendid vestment and stood before the congregation in a milk-white robe. Taking a towel, he knelt before the twelve and washed their feet in silence. When he was to kneel before the priest representing the apostle Peter, the priest exclaimed: "Lord, thou shalt never wash my feet." The reply came in the words of the Scripture and the ceremony continued. This ceremony of pomp and pride in teaching the lesson of humility was a parody, a mockery. When Christ washed the feet of the apostles, he told them to follow his example. The dignitary of the Greek Church clung to the outer letter and lost the inner spirit in his foot-washing service; with his jewels and costly vestments, and pomp and spectacular ritual, he gave a proud imitation of humility. Christ not only washed the apostles' feet to teach the lesson of humility, but also that of spiritual perfection. "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me," he said; and Peter caught this thought when he replied:

Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head. (John 13: 9.)

Discovered Antiseptic Surgery

IT IS hardly thinkable that the man who discovered antiseptic surgery, one of the greatest physical blessings ever bestowed upon the race, has just been gathered to his fathers. Sir Joseph Lister in his vigorous eighties went to sleep the other day under enduring glory as the discoverer of antiseptic surgery, through which more people have been saved by the surgeons from wounds in war and peace than through all the developments of surgical science for a hundred years. His king made Lister a baronet in recognition of his discovery, and the civilized world crowns him as a king in the realm of science, mercy and love. It is accorded few men so to contribute to physical happiness and longevity. His discoveries and his sweet ministry will be perpetuated to coming generations in harmony with the following statement of the truth:

They may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them. (Rev. 14: 13.)

Record Time Building a Church

ON MAY 1, on a lot in Spartanburg, S. C., which at dawn had been vacant, the Bethel Methodist Church, a neat edifice with a seating capacity for 800 persons, stood that same night, having been erected, painted, papered, furnished with pews and altar, and equipped with electrical and plumbing fixtures between the rising and the setting of the sun. The feat was performed in the presence of 18,000 persons, while the band played lively airs and moving picture men reeled off thousands of feet of films. One hundred and twenty workmen were engaged in the task of erecting the building. Rev. J. W. Speak invoked the divine blessing on the enterprise at six o'clock A.M. Major A. H. Kirby, eighty-three years old, drove the first nail as the carpenters started. The church was dedicated the same evening. A two weeks' revival service followed the dedication exercises. It is said that the Methodist Episcopal Church builds two new churches every day in the year, and other denominations are equally diligent in church extension work. A material house has been necessary for a spiritual residence. The church building has been necessary to house a spiritual Christianity, and to establish Christ's kingdom in the earth. Every dispensation of divine providence has recognized the most vital relationship between the material house of the Lord and spiritual success. Voicing this truth was the command:

Let the house of God be builded in his place. (Ezra. 5: 15.)

Modest Heroism

ISRAEL GREENBERG, seven years old, was playing on the string-piece of Pier 21, East River, New York, when he tripped and fell into the water. A woman who saw him fall ran for help, and the first person she met was a neatly dressed man who had come off one of the New Haven boats. The man dropped his valise, ran to the spot and dived into the water. He swam to the boy, and grabbing him, managed to get him aboard a sand barge. Patrolman Meyers found the man and the boy on the barge, and asked the man his name. "You don't want my name," said the man. "That isn't necessary. Just show me a place where I can change my clothes. That is all I want." The policeman called an ambulance, and the boy was removed to the Hudson Street Hospital. Then Meyers led the rescuer to a seaman's lodging house. He took a suit out of his valise and put his wet suit into the valise, and went on his journey. Every effort was made at the lodging house to have the man reveal his identity, but he said: "I only did my duty; only a little thing unworthy of any notice in the papers or public praise." It was a beautiful, heroic thing to save a life as he did, but a doubly beautiful thing to be so modest and humble about it. Human nature is such that praise is sought for the most commonplace acts, and in those of heroism there may be a just pride. The modest, manly man did not get his name in the papers nor apply for a medal as would have been the natural or proper desire, but he knows himself, and God knows him. The modesty Christ taught in acts of charity the man illustrated in his heroic act.

But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth. (Matt. 6: 3.)

IN THE REALM OF YOUTH

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Sewing by Hand

WHEN the sewing machine first came into general use a great many good people regarded it with suspicion and declared that it would take the bread from poor families who were dependent upon the slender wage-earnings of women whose tool was the needle. The time has so long gone by that comparatively few recall it vividly, but if anywhere there is a grandmother who sat and sewed a long white seam when she was a girl in her teens, she may hark back in mind to arguments pro and con, warmly supported by debaters on both sides. The introduction of machinery in a large number of crafts temporarily reduced the means of those who had worked by themselves in home manufactures. In the end conditions changed and society and the wage-earners alike profited by the application of inventions to productive use.

The click of the sewing machine is familiar everywhere in these days, and no house is well furnished without this obliging fairy who runs off tuck and seam and gusset and band with lightning speed.

Sewing by hand, neglected for a while, has now become one of the fine arts. Hand needlework is highly prized and commands liberal remuneration. Some years ago a brave little woman found herself suddenly thrown upon her own resources with two little children to support and not sufficient money to pay the rent of a small apartment for a single month. She went to a friend and told him that she knew how to sew, that she could sew beautifully, and she asked advice as to how she could obtain materials and get her work into the hands of people whom it would attract, and who might be willing to pay for it at its real valuation. She was advised to do the best she could, charge high prices for it and secure a clientèle among rich women. Being gifted with initiative, energy and a sixth sense that amounted to genius, she valiantly went to work, made a lovely dress for an infant and sent it by mail to a woman, at that time known the wide land over, a woman whose name and endorsement would be enough to crown any one's venture with success. The little dress was sent by mail, and was followed in a day or two by a letter of explanation. From that small beginning a score of years ago has arisen a large and profitable business in which are now employed nearly a hundred women, and whereof the profits reach annually many thousands of dollars. Her one weapon of defense against the world was her needle, and she is making her fortune by hand needlework.

There has lately been a revival of the beautiful cross stitch in worsted, specimens of which are seen on old-fashioned samplers. The work is attractive to children and is less taxing to the eye-sight of grown people than the fine embroidery which is always in vogue.

The peasant girl who is making a garment for her trousseau is engaged in work very dear to a woman's heart. How lovingly her stitches are set in the dainty fabric, and how much one wishes that her dreams may all come true! The artist has caught the precise expression that reveals of whom the maiden thinks as she fashions the raiment that shall be part of her wedding outfit.

Dolls and Dolls' Houses

SOME years ago Mrs. Laura Starr of New York published a very interesting volume in which she unfolded the history of the doll as it belongs to the story of civilization. A similar book has recently been written by an English author, Mrs. Nelville Jackson. This book, as well as that of Mrs. Starr, is enriched by many interesting illustrations, and contains many curious bits of domestic history. The doll is dear to the heart of the little girl, whether she be a small princess royal or the child of a poor peasant.

A lady walking one day on Water Street, New York, stopped to look at a ragged little maiden who was sitting on a doorstep. In her thin arms she held something over which she crooned a lullaby, rocking to and fro and hugging her treasure to her breast. On investigation it was found that the forlorn child, herself a waif of the street, had made her doll out of an empty beer bottle picked up in the gutter. Around it she had wrapped the fragment of a tattered shawl. Poor baby! Even in her heart the instinct of maternity had sprung up, and she was satisfying it as best she could with this wretched makeshift of a doll.

One feels happy that there are Sunday schools and settlements and friendly associations which, among their other tasks from time to time, furnish the little daughters of the tenement with real dolls. When these dolls have eyes that open and shut, knees and elbows that bend and hair that may be combed around the finger, the happiness of the child owners becomes complete. In the matter of appreciating a doll the little girl, as she emerges from infancy, shows the peculiarities of her sex. Occasionally, boys care for dolls, but as a rule they treat them with indifference and prefer trains of cars, boxes of blocks, balls and tops. Girls seldom care to fly kites, while the normal boy takes to this pastime as a duck to water.

WE LEARN from the compilations of the industrious English and American authors that the doll dates back to the time when people ceased to be cave dwellers and preferred the shelter of huts of stone or houses of wood. Along the ages the doll has held her own, from the rudely carved wooden images of a remote period down to the latest fashionable creations of modern Paris. Whole villages in Switzerland and Germany find employment in the making of dolls. The doll that shall smile on an American child when next the Christmas tapers twinkle from the laden boughs of the greenwood tree will be a little traveler in a box with many other travelers that cross the ocean in the hold of a steamship.

In the nurseries of the Spanish queen and the Czar of Russia, in the palaces of England and under the royal roof of Queen Wilhelmina, as well as under the gentle reign of the beautiful queen of Italy, dolls and toys of every kind abound. Still it is probable that even royal children would be astonished could they survey the extravagance displayed by Americans of wealth in supplying their children with dolls. Indeed, the daughter of an American mechanic or salesman often has dolls enough to enable her to play at housekeeping or at schoolkeeping quite successfully. Where her mother was satisfied with two dolls, and her grandmother with one, the young person of the present often possesses from eight to fifteen of these little images. Her dolls are of varying sizes and degrees of magnificence. Once in a while she has a doll's house with several rooms and elaborate furniture.

Trailing Arbutus

A YEAR ago, in the sweet spring weather,
We sought the trailing arbutus together.
Brushing the withered leaves aside,
And the long pine needles, brown and dried,
We found the vine, with glossy green,
And its clustering flowers coy between.
Over the waxen petals white
Hovered a blush as they met the light.

Pure as the look a maiden wears
As forth she comes from her morning prayers,
I gathered the lovely things for you,
With the breath of the woods in their drops of dew;
And home we went by the common way,
With a halo around our holiday,
For we both had lost and we both had found
A something sweet on the forest ground.

And if your heart was exchanged for mine,
As we sought the blossom beneath the pine,
The pine was far too high to hear
The words I whispered in your ear.
But the shy arbutus knew of the "Yes"
That you let me seal with love's first kiss;
And so this year, in the fair spring weather,
We will hunt for spring's sweet blooms together.

A Question for Parents

THE following questions are submitted to the parents who read this page, and answers may be sent by both fathers and mothers. Whom do you consider most receptive to good influences, quickest to learn in the schoolroom and most likely to succeed in life, your sons or your daughters? Do you approve of co-education after the age of twelve? Do you wish precisely the same education to be given to your daughters and to your sons?

These queries are suggested by a recent action of the London School Board. The board has discovered that the presence of the girls in the schoolroom is a disadvantage to the boys. They declare that the girls are slower to learn than the boys, and therefore retard the progress of the latter. They further affirm in substance that girls do not need the thorough book education demanded by boys. They wish girls to be gentle and womanly, while boys are to be brave and manly. Precisely what they mean by womanly and what by manly the average American can only conjecture. American parents need not accept the English point of view. The probability is that a majority of the pupils in the London schools have behind them a background of ancestry that, while it may be worthy, has not been especially highly educated. The public schools of England, such as Eton, Rugby and Winchester, are large and noble institutions to which the sons of the nobility and gentry, the clergy and the cultivated commoners are sent. They are wholly devoted to boys. The city free schools attended by both sexes are of a different grade from those with which we are familiar here. Still, it is a little amazing to be told that girls make slower progress than boys. Kindly send replies to the editor of this page, written on one side only of the paper.

THE FALLING OF THE MANTLE

BY JEAN MAHAN PLANK

THE evening the baby was born, Peter Vanderkemp was saying to his cousin Silas Brand, as they sat sorting pears in the shed: "No, I hadn't the call—I knew that. I liked to preach, and wanted to. It was a pleasure for me to stand up before all the folks, and slowly button my coat across my stomach. It gave me an awful good feeling to warm up as I got to goin'; I liked the glow and the fervor."

Peter stopped, and took a bite out of a pear that was specked on one side. Silas immediately did the same and observed: "But them was some mighty fine talks you give us after the old Dominie left, while we was candidatin'. They stirred the folks up considerable."

"Oh, I ain't sayin' that I haven't convictions, and that I don't like to rub 'em into other people." Peter's big, wholesome laugh rang out, and his red face crinkled up into kindly, humorous lines. "I love preachin' still, and always will; but"—his face sobered to something as near sternness as it ever came—"a man who goes into preachin' without the call is playin' with fire. I tried hard enough to hear the call, goodness knows, for—I never told ye, Silas—it was bitter to me to give it up—at the time. Mortifyin', too, for you know old Uncle Peter, the one I was named for, offered to pay my way through the seminary."

"Well, why on airth didn't ye go? Wan't that a 'call'?" Silas aimed his core with precision and upset the dignity of a passing hen.

Over Peter's countenance came a change. It was like the falling of a veil, not upon the face, but from it; as when the mists suddenly cleared to reveal the soft beauty of the Catskills, visible from where the men were sitting. At such times Peter's friends had learned to stop what they were doing, and listen.

"The call doesn't come from without," he said gently, folding his hands together; "it comes from within. Before I began to pray that I might hear it clearly, I was all for bein' a preacher. I was cocksure that I was predestined to stand in the pulpit with one hand upraised and the other thrust into my bosom. But by and by I began to go off alone by myself like I'd seen the Dominie do, and before I knew it, the Spirit got hold of me, and something told me to pray for a clear call. I did pray, but the call didn't come. I found myself hankerin' more and more for these farm lands, stones and all, and for the little pink pigs, and the baby-faced calves, and for all the young and growin' things And if I hadn't followed after my own hankerin's"—Peter resumed his pear-sorting and Silas followed his example—"I would never have had my Pattie. I tell ye, Silas, that woman— But what I started to say is this: The preachin' has always been like a mantle that was mine yet it didn't quite fit; and there's been the thought that the boy, when he comes, will grow right up into a shape to wear that mantle. Why, it'll be a glorious thing"—his face reddened with eagerness—"better than if I had worn it myself, for the boy—"

"Ye seem all-fired sure it'll be a boy," remarked Silas drily; "what if it ain't?"

Peter glanced blankly at his cousin. "Oh, of course we don't know," he said slowly, "but then our family kind o' runs to boys. But what was I sayin'? I've put a sum of money out to compound interest, and by the time the boy is ready for the seminary, say eighteen or twenty, it will be more than two thousand dollars. I call it the 'mantle money.'"

Peter arose and left the shed with the intention of rolling another barrel of pears to the heap. As his handsome, well-set head turned in the direction of the big white farmhouse, his shoulders suddenly straightened, and he started with magnificent strides toward the pump under the apple-trees.

"Hi, there, you Pattie!" he roared, "haven't I told ye not to lift a bucket o' water when ye got yer big hulk of a husband about? You little skeesicks! Why didn't ye blow the horn?"

Pattie looked up fondly as Peter seized the bucket, put an arm tenderly about her, and led her toward the house.

That very night, the husband's spirit wrestled in agony as the woman he loved went down into the valley in order that God might work through her what has always been and always will be a miracle. Toward morning Peter stopped his pacing under the stars at a call from Aunt Nancy Van Schendel.

"Peter, Peter, come! It's all right. It's a fine little child—a girl."

A girl! Peter cast one look up at the stars, which seemed to recede; he uttered a prayer, and then, when he entered the room where his wife lay with her little tired face one wistful smile, and her eyes like the stars themselves, none would have dreamed that he had been disappointed. Indeed, his joy was not assumed when the tiny, warm bundle was laid in his arms, for all little things found a natural home in the heart of Peter Vanderkemp.

Little Ruth was no exception to that rule. Her small world was so filled with love and tenderness and so abundantly provided with wonderful things for her to love in turn, that she grew into a most winsome creature, with dewy lips, a round, brown little face, and star eyes like her mother's.

Drawn by Thornton D. Skidmore

"'Do you suppose . . . Do you suppose that that is what artists are for?'"

When she was pattering about the vast old kitchen, that most attractive apartment of the York State farmhouse, with its huge fireplace, its bright-colored rag carpet, and its general air of cheerful homeliness, the child would be given by Pattie bits of dough on a little board and told to go out on the porch and "play make bread." Ruth reveled in the dough, and she would sit for hours fashioning queer figures that had no resemblance whatever to bread or biscuits.

One morning, after she had been working and humming like a little bee, she called to Pattie: "Munnie—Munnie! Come see dollies! See, Munnie!"

Pattie went out upon the porch, pushed back with her wrist a curl of hair from her moist, white forehead, and gazed for a puzzled instant at the crude little shapes.

"Why, they look as if they were real!" she cried to Peter, who stood drinking at the well. "There's one seems to be actually moving. Come and see, Peter!" But Peter only laughed a bit at the child's "graven images."

It was not until a visiting cousin brought a miniature box of colors and brushes that Pattie began to look at her child with inquiry and a sweet doubt in her eyes. Ruth could make wonderful dolls of pasteboard and marvelous costumes of tissue paper. It was the painted faces, however, that drew the mother's questioning gaze. The eyes of the puppets looked out knowingly; the smiles were familiar.

When Pattie drew her husband's attention to this, Peter laughed rather uneasily and said:

"Well, that's better than makin' things so much like graven images. How old is she now—six? Better get her a little thimble, Pattie, and start her to sewin'. Makin' real doll clothes will get those paintin' notions out of her head."

Ruth was interested in the thimble, but she utterly refused to fashion conventional garments. She took the pieces of bright lawn her mother gave her and cut and slashed with much delight, the joy being rather in the handling of materials of color than in any material longing that her best doll should go clothed in fine raiment.

To Peter, these tendencies finally became no laughing matter. "I tell ye what, Pattie," he said one night at supper, with an anxious glance at his little daughter who had dropped asleep on the settle, "I'm goin' to keep the baby outdoors with me as much as I can. What do you think I found her doin' this afternoon when I went up to the spare room to fix that window? The little rascal was standin' on a chair in front o' the lookin' glass, drawin' her own picture; and, Pattie, that's 'vanity o' vanities.' Now, you've got to let those paintin' things 'get lost' somehow, and I'll make her a little garden, and teach her to ride horseback. I'll buy her some outdoors playthings, too."

Peter's plan seemed to succeed. Ruth forgot her paints, and proceeded to grow into a splendid little tomboy, and eventually into a fine, strong young woman.

It was when she was sixteen that her cousin, Mary Brand, out from Catskill for a week's visit, bubbled over with enthusiastic references to Miss Gertrude Hamerton and her newly opened studio.

"She's from Boston," explained Mary, "and she paints wonderful pictures, though she says she hasn't finished her course yet. And her brother is one of the professors in a big art school in Boston. Miss Hamerton says that the school is very conservative and academic"—Mary had caught the jargon, and delivered it with imposing grandeur—"and it requires a severe drawing course. Her brother studied at the Beaux Arts in Paris." Ruth listened with the air of a kitten watching a dangling string. Mary's glowing words meant nothing to her. She was observing the way the side of her cousin's mouth twisted as she talked; she also noted that a straggling lock of straight, dark hair fell over Mary's red cheek as if blown by a wind. Something about the lock and the twisted corner of the mouth brought a pleased look into Ruth's face. Her eyes glistened back and forth from one to the other.

Mary took Ruth home with her for a visit. If Peter had only known, that was the last he was to see of his "baby girl." As she went with her cousin toward Mrs. Payson's big brick house, in whose ivy-grown wing Miss Hamerton had her studio, Ruth skipped every third step with the joy of a young lamb's gambols and hummed snatches of childish songs. Her pink chambray gown came just to her boot-tops, and her hair hung in two long, thick curls below her waist. It was thus she went into the studio—a frolicsome kitten, a rosy, rollicking tomboy, with a heart as free as a newly-fledged singing-bird. An hour later she came out a woman; more than a woman—a consecrated soul. For little Ruth had seen a vision, and the vision had looked at her "with the bright eyes of beauty," and the girl could never again belong to herself.

The silently deepening course of her mind during the next few weeks led her to surprise her father, one day, with the suggestion that in the coming fall she wanted to teach the country school. Peter was pleased. Most of the women of his kinsfolk had been teachers; Ruth's desire showed that she had the family pluck. It was no trouble to get the school, as the girl had always been first in her studies, and being much beloved, there was little danger of her encountering the usual difficulties incident to country school-teaching. With the brilliant autumn days, consequently, she quietly took up the work.

One Saturday Mary Brand came out to spend the day and brought Miss Hamerton with her. The art student was a slender young woman with a serious, refined face, an absent smile, and graceful motions and manners. Peter heard the three girls chatting together as they sat in the sunlight on the woodpile. Mary was teasing Ruth and coaxing her to show Miss Hamerton the contents of a certain bureau drawer in her bedroom. He heard Ruth's embarrassed protests, and saw her being led, with flushed reluctance, toward the house. He did not, however, realize the significance of the circumstance until he was confronted out near the smokehouse by Miss Hamerton with a bunch of papers in her hand, and a flashing enthusiasm in her face, which transformed her into a beautiful woman.

"You cannot know, I am sure, Mr. Vanderkemp, what talent you have in your daughter, both in drawing and coloring. I think—I am sure—there is genius. I wish you could see your way to letting her go back with me to Boston when I go to resume my studies after the holidays."

Peter's face had flushed darkly red. While he knew that Miss Hamerton meant well, yet he was as near angry at her as he could be with a woman. When he found his voice, he spoke rather sternly:

"Why, Ruthie is a teacher, Miss Hamerton. She hasn't time to be painting pictures. She has just done those things for fun once in a while; but Ruthie is going to be a—a serious woman, and all the women of my family have been teachers." He opened the door of the smokehouse. "Ruth likes her teaching, too."

He was sure she liked it—the more sure because he was able to come home from town the following Saturday and deliver himself of the proud news that Ruth's teaching had attracted the attention of the school committee in Catskill. Mr. Grove had stopped him in the street and talked about it. Although the girl was very young for the situation, yet if she would go through the Normal that was to be held during the coming holidays, and would also pledge herself to study at the one usually held in the summer, she might have, beginning with the January term, a most desirable place in the graded school.

Peter radiated jokes and merriment. "Hi, there, little Peter!" he cried, rallying the girl with his tomboy name for her. "You're your daddy's own boy, ain't you?" He tilted back the head, so like his own handsome one, and kissed the face in which he always saw his wife's sweetness.

"Hi, there, big Peter!" responded Ruth with her accustomed answer. If the words came out rather more quietly than usual, there was small wonder, for the child was having greatness thrust upon her.

"They'll be out this afternoon late to talk about it—Mr. Grove and Mr. Darst—and you better do your pigtails in a waterfall on the top of your head, Miss Schoolma'am," suggested Peter, with a fond embrace.

At half past five, the committee arrived duly, and was ushered by Peter with unusual ceremony into the square parlor, which was opened only for special occasions. The two dignitaries were then left to stare around the big, bare room, whose old-fashioned simplicity had, through Pattie's instinctive taste, been left free from attempt at tawdry ornament.

Peter returned to the kitchen and met the questioning gaze of two pairs of bright eyes with the quiet remark:

"They want you, Ruthie. You go in; I'll sit here with mamma." He seated himself with large complacency in his wooden rocker, as Ruth, silent and very pale, started down the long, wide hall.

"I'll tell you what, mamma," said Peter, as he rocked vigorously to and fro, "we won't let Ruthie use her little school salary for the expense of the Normal. There's that money, you know, we used to call the 'mantle money'; it's all to be for her anyway."

The interview in the parlor was a brief one. Pattie and Peter, sitting in breathless silence, heard the girl come out again, followed by the committee, whose departure she rather deftly speeded through the front entrance. Then they heard the light footsteps come slowly down the hall, and presently Ruth appeared in the doorway and stood with eyes downcast toward a zigzag pattern in the rag carpet.

"How is it, Miss Schoolma'am?" was Peter's jocose inquiry. "Goin' to put on long skirts now and wear glasses, eh?"

Ruth raised her head. Over her face, which turned very white, there came something of her father's unveiled expression.

"I am not going to teach, papa," she said in a strained voice. "I am going to study painting—to be an artist."

Something snapped within Peter Vanderkemp. He arose stiffly from the wooden rocker. He had never scolded Ruth, and words of reproof did not easily rise to his lips. His silence, for this reason, was the more terrible. His daughter, looking into his face as he went out the door that led to the garden, clasped her hands quickly to her heart as if she had been wounded, and sank slowly to her knees.

Up and down the gravel path between the leafless rosebushes Peter Vanderkemp strode fiercely in the autumn twilight, and wrestled with an intolerable weight of anger which tortured his gentle soul none the less because he felt it to be righteous. He could give up the profession he loved, could welcome a daughter in place of a son; these things were of the Lord's doing, and must become good in his own sight; but here was no working of the will of God; it was an incomprehensible running after strange gods, a yearning toward vanities. His child, who had become as the apple of his eye, was pressing to her father's lips a cup the bitterness of which was not unmingled with shame.

He had not long to wrestle alone. As he stopped by the gate and stared toward the horizon where the moon, huge and grotesque, seemed to grin at him uncomprehendingly, he heard a swift running behind him. In another instant his daughter's arms were about his neck.

"Papa! papa!" sobbed the girl. "Don't ever look again like that, papa! I did not dream it would make you so unhappy. Why, I couldn't make you feel like you looked, papa. It would kill me. I'll go with you next Saturday and tell the committee that I will go to the Normal, and I will take the school. I didn't think—it all seemed to come over me as I stood there before them, papa, that I was to refuse. But I will." She buried her head in his bosom as she clung about his neck.

Peter's big hands were soothing and petting the girl, and when he spoke his voice shook under a strong revulsion of feeling. "There—there, Ruthie! Don't cry, dear! Papa doesn't want you to do a thing that would make you unhappy. Why not—why not give it all up and settle down here with Munnie and learn to be a little housekeeper? You don't have to teach."

"But I can do anything, papa"—Ruth looked up, and in the moonlight her smile shone with moist sweetness—"anything that would please you. Nothing is hard when I know that you want me to do it."

They stood for a minute clinging passionately to each other, then they walked slowly into the house where Pattie, with loving wisdom, was hastily preparing a hot supper.

Later, when Ruth had gone up stairs and Peter was covering the fire for the night, he said to his wife:

"What do you reckon got into the little rascal? Not to want to teach! She doesn't like housework, and, Pattie," he laid down the shovel and looked at his wife with some dismay, "you wouldn't think Ruthie was—was lazy, Pattie?"

"Peter Vanderkemp!" It was Pattie's turn to rise with dignity. Her ewe lamb was assailed by a suspicion almost unmentionable in a York State farmhouse.

"Oh, I was only jokin', Pattie," begged Peter with a shamefaced laugh.

"Lazy!" exclaimed Pattie. "Look how she nursed me last winter for three weeks. night and day, and the best nursing I ever had in my life; and look how if either of us needs anything she'll run her feet nearly off to do for us. It's only that she forgets little things when there's no special necessity."

Peter felt a wave of compunction which sent him to the foot of the stairs to listen for the patter of Ruth's little feet overhead.

"Hi, there, little Peter!" His tones had a note of inquiry.

"Hi, there, big Peter!" came back with fine cheeriness from above.

"That girl's got the stuff," he observed in a conciliatory manner to his wife.

During the night that followed, the first snow fell; not one of the drifting sort, but deep enough to start the sleigh-bells jingling as the church-goers passed through the Vanderkemp homestead on their way to Leeds. In the afternoon Miss Hamerton came out for a ride and brought a little present for Ruth, as she might not see the girl again before her departure for Boston.

It was a drawing in color of a short stretch of the Catskill road, and had been done the previous winter by Miss Hamerton's brother during a sketching trip in the mountains and the surrounding villages.

Ruth looked at the gift with eyes that flashed a comprehension of its beauty. She silently handed it to her mother, who set the picture temporarily upon the chimney-piece in the kitchen, where it became a target for Peter's jovial comments upon the "chromo." After a few days Pattie hung the picture in the parlor. Peter, coming in to supper, asked: "What have you done with Ruth's chromo?" Afterward, he went into the parlor and fetched the painting back to the chimney-piece.

"I sort of miss the thing," he explained sheepishly to Pattie. "I don't know why," he went on, "but some way when I look at that it makes me feel kind o' young again." He bent nearer to the sketch. "It's sort o' pretty, isn't it—like—but then, that man has made it pretty," he added scornfully, "putting in lavender snow and navy blue fences. Don't you like it, Pattie?"

"Why, Peter, of course I like it. Peter, I—I used to paint flowers myself before you came to see me." Pattie glanced at her big husband rather bashfully. "And don't you remember, I showed you some I was doing one night before we went to singing-school, and you laughed and said the kind of flower you liked to see me working over was the kind that went into doughnuts and pies?" Pattie laughed a bit, but in Peter's consciousness was born the germ of an idea that his wife, too, might have done some giving up in her life.

On Friday morning the little family was early astir, for a trip to Catskill must be made, as there were certain affairs that could not wait for the next day when Ruth was to go in to see the committee. The sleighing, having been reinforced by a light fall in the night, was still fair, and the husband and wife slid and bumped silently along the winding country road until they came to the turn just beyond the bridge, when Peter uttered an exclamation.

"By juckey! Pattie, look! If there isn't the very spot that that man made the picture of!"

He stopped the sleigh and gazed at the strip of wintry road with its ruts and banks of snow, which disappeared, after a few yards, into a mystery of frosty laurels, maples and wild grapevines beyond.

"Why, them spruces and oaks on the side spread out across the sky just like they do in the picture! Only the snow isn't—well, I'll be honswazzled! If that snow isn't lavender! Git-ap, Jinnie 'n' Jerry!"

Pattie, pondering in her soul, did not answer.

When, in the early twilight, they drove back, Peter glanced frequently from side to side. Once he called Pattie's attention to a cloud, and said it looked like Ruth's new green veil. He did not break the silence again until they came within sight of the vista which Hamerton had painted, when he stopped the horses.

"Pattie, I've been wonderin' why I thought that was pretty this mornin'. It doesn't look the same exactly now, it's different—why, the snow isn't lavender now, it's kind o' pink. Do you see, Pattie? Now, I wonder," he started the team, "why that looks beautiful to me. Do you suppose it's because I've seen it in a picture?" He glanced back. "It looks like a picture, doesn't it?"

"Yes, it does, Peter," murmured Pattie.

They crossed the bridge, climbed a hill, and were once more trotting briskly when the team was suddenly drawn up again.

"What is it, Peter?" asked Pattie anxiously.

He turned squarely about and faced her. "Do you suppose—now I never saw that that there place was beautiful till I saw Ruth's picture. Do you suppose that that is what artists are for? Do you reckon artists have a—a mission? Mebbe it isn't just makin' a picture to be admired and to decorate a parlor. Why, Pattie, it's kind o' like a—" his voice dropped, "a gospel!"

Pattie's eyes were slowly filling with tears. "I think," she said, catching a little sob, "that God has many gospels. Some preach one, some another."

"Then, don't they have to be called for that as well as for preachin'?" Peter was speaking now more to himself than to Pattie, and the "veil" seemed to drop from his face. Turning in his seat, he started the horses and said nothing more until, through the fallen dusk, they drove into the shelter of the shed to which Ruth came running out to open the gates.

"Hi, there, big Peter!" cried the girl, as her father sprang out of the sleigh.

But big Peter did not answer. He strode to the gates, and took his child's soft face between his hands. In the dim light he spoke in a low tone:

"You get yourself ready, young woman, to go into Catskill village bright 'n' early to-morrow morning. We got work to do there, you and me."

"Yes, papa, I know; I'll be ready." Later, Peter heard her saying to her mother: "Hadn't you better let me wear your black worsted skirt to go and see the committee to-morrow? I feel sort of funny in short dresses now."

"Food, Drink, Refreshment and Nourishment All in One"

THIS is what Farmers' Bulletin 175, published by the United States Department of Agriculture, has to say of grape juice, if it is correctly made, so that it preserves the wonderful health-giving qualities of the grape.

For that grapes are one of Nature's most valuable tonics, improving digestion, increasing appetite, yielding energy and vitality, was long ago proved by the famous foreign grape "cures"—

Health-giving qualities which you may enjoy daily by drinking

Armour's Grape Juice

The Family Drink

Bottled Where the Best Grapes Grow

The Armour Factories, situated in the heart of the famous grape growing districts of Michigan and New York, command the cream of each season's Concord Grape crop.

Each day's picking, sun ripened to fullest perfection, goes to press that day. None are left over to wilt or wither.

No sweetening, no diluting. Armour's Grape Juice is the pure, rich grape extract preserved only by sterilization and air-tight bottling.

Armour's Grape Juice is sold by grocers and druggists at fountains, buffets and clubs. Drink it with meals and between meals all summer. It helps you resist the lassitude which comes with the hot weather.

Utility Wall Board is used on the walls and ceiling of this attractive apartment—it is paneled with dark oak strips and decorated with flat tints of delft and dark blue

More Attractive Walls Easier Put On And at Less Cost!

We want every man and woman in this country who owns or rents a home to have a free sample of

Utility Wall Board

If you haven't had your sample, write for it to-day—ask for the Utility Book of home interiors.

Utility Wall Board is a tough-fibre board put together with two insulations of natural waterproof asphalt, all rolled under tremendous pressure into one solid, compact sheet and surfaced on both sides with special moisture proofing. It is the only Wall Board made under this scientific moisture-proof process.

It is very tough and durable—it will not crack or warp or shrink, and it has a beautiful surface for decorating or paneling.

Utility Wall Board takes the place of lath and plaster—it is attached directly to the studding, without any of the dirt or muss of plastering. You don't have to wait for it to dry—anyone can put it on, and it can be used not only in building the new house but in making over the old—put it right over the old plaster if you want to.

It will last as long as the house stands—and IT COSTS LESS THAN LATH AND PLASTER.

Don't fail to write for the sample and Booklet.

China's New Minister

CHUNG MUN YEW, who has been selected as the first minister of the new republic of China to the United States, is perhaps as interesting a personality as any envoy who has ever come to our shores from the Orient. Like several of the other statesmen who have in recent years served as Chinese minister at Washington Mr. Chung was educated in American schools—the public schools of Hartford, Conn., and Yale University. Moreover, he owes his present appointment to the friendship of another American-educated Chinaman, namely, Tang Shao Yi, the premier of the new Chinese republic.

Mr. Chung was a member of the International Opium Commission and his American experience included several years of service as secretary of legation at Washington under Minister Wu. Finally it may be noted that he was for a time Chinese Consul General at Manila, so that he has a knowledge of conditions in the Philippines that is bound to prove of advantage to an Oriental envoy transacting business with the American Government. Minister Chung's only son is now at school in the United States.

Minister Chung Mun Yew

A few weeks ago the new minister with his wife and two daughters assisted at the christening of the first Chinese naval vessel constructed in this country. Miss Chung Yuyi, the minister's oldest daughter, went through the usual ceremony of christening the ship, giving it the name Fei Hung. The Misses Chung attracted considerable attention as they were dressed in very up-to-date white serge tailor-made suits, with white shoes and picture hats. All the other Chinese who participated in or attended the christening were also dressed in American costume. Besides the Chinese minister, his wife and daughters, three officers of the Chinese navy took part in the naming of the new cruiser.

The boat is intended for a training ship for Chinese officers. Its length is 320 feet, displacement 2,600 tons. It will be capable of about twenty knots and will carry 232 officers and crew.

Minister Chung predicted that this is only the first of a number of cruisers to be built here for the Chinese navy.

The Falling of the Mantle

During the drive next morning Peter was silent, so far as talk was concerned; at intervals, nevertheless, he broke out into a joyous hymn. Once he stopped the team and put his arm about his daughter.

"Ruthie," he said, and kissed the full, red lips, "papa thinks you are the bravest little girl he ever knew in his life."

Ruth flashed a soft glance up at him, as a rosy flush of pleased surprise crossed her little brown face. "Do you, papa? I don't know why. I love to do anything for you, papa." She raised the hand that had her muff over it, and patted the side of his head. Peter drove on. As they entered the village he quickened the pace of his horses to a stiff trot, and presently drew up in front of Mrs. Payson's big brick house.

"Why, papa, why do you stop here? Aren't we going first to the committee?"

Peter was out of the sleigh. He seized the girl in his strong arms, and with a circle through the air he landed her little feet upon the pavement of broken bricks.

"Committee be honswazzled! You run in and ask Miss Gertrude Hamerton when she's goin' back to Boston; for when she does you are goin' with her—to study. Now run along, I've—"

"Papa!"

"I've got to get to the bank on business. I'll call for you later and talk things over with Miss Hamerton. Well, well, don't cry, little Peter! Where's that brave girl that would do anything to please her papa? Hi, there, little Peter! Git-ap, Jinnie 'n' Jerry!" He looked back, laughing, to see Ruth's face like a rainbow between smiles and tears.

That night he suddenly caught his wife in his arms, looked down into the star eyes, and called her by the name he always used in times of deep emotion:

"Lovey dear, it's the mantle—the mantle of us both. Don't you see? God's calls are more far-reaching than our dull ears can realize. The call was sounding, not for me, but through me, and through you; and it was for little Ruth the mantle was shapen—the mantle of us both."

THE BEST WIND

WHICHEVER way the wind doth blow,
Some heart is glad to have it so;
Then blow it east or blow it west,
The wind that blows, that wind is best.

My little craft sails not alone;
A thousand fleets from every zone
Are out upon a thousand seas;
And what for me were favoring breeze
Might dash another with the shock
Of doom upon some hidden rock.
And so I do not care to pray
For winds to waft me on my way,
But leave it to a higher will
To stay or speed me, trusting still
That all is well, and sure that he
Who launched my bark will sail with me
Through storm and calm, and will not fail,
Whatever breezes may prevail,
To land me, every peril past,
Within his sheltering heaven at last.

Caroline Atwater Mason, in the Methodist Recorder.

"Standard" GUARANTEED PLUMBING FIXTURES

EVERY night is tub night when "Standard" Fixtures are in the home. The delight which the convenience, beauty and refinement of "Standard" Fixtures create in the use of the bathroom, makes daily bathing the rule in every home possessing them. Children especially are drawn to cleanliness by the appeal of their attractiveness. Their resistance to time and use, makes their purchase the most economical of all the homebuilder's expenditures.

Genuine "Standard" fixtures for the Home and for School, Office Buildings, Public Institutions, etc., are identified by the Green and Gold Label, with the exception of one brand of baths bearing the Red and Black Label, which, while of the first quality of manufacture, have a slightly thinner enameling, and thus meet the requirements of those who demand "Standard" quality at less expense. All "Standard" fixtures, with care, will last a lifetime. And no fixture is genuine unless it bears the guarantee label. In order to avoid the substitution of inferior fixtures, specify "Standard" goods in writing (not verbally) and make sure that you get them.

The "Golden Age" Ahead!

This is the theme of a wonderful book by Ritter Brown, a new Prophet of social and economic reform, who has sounded a note that deserves to be heard around the world. Henry George, Bellamy and other great thinkers of the past, pointed out the injustice of our present social and economic system; but Mr. Ritter Brown, who deserves to rank with any of his prophetic predecessors, takes a wider range. In his book entitled he shows, with evidence that carries conviction and with an intensity of earnestness that grips the heart and brain of his readers, how man's divine heritage—the soil—has been seized and appropriated by the few to the detriment of all others. How it can be restored is also told in these wonderful chapters.

"Man's Birthright"

Ritter Brown's book should be in the hands of every intelligent American citizen who loves his native country and his people. It is better than all the college courses on political economy. He tells how the "War of the Classes" progresses; how the land has fallen under the blight of exclusive ownership; how cities, states and countries have been well-nigh depopulated as a result; how a train of other evils has followed this initial perversion of divine munificence; how public utilities have been grasped by trusts, syndicates and individuals; how legislation has been controlled and the judiciary utilized for selfish purposes; and how forests, mines, fisheries and transportation have largely shared the same fate.

Then, like a true prophet, he points out the remedy for these conditions. He is in no sense a socialist, for he frankly points out the fallacies of that system. He is in the broadest sense a reformer, however, and the remedy he indicates for present conditions is one that will appeal to all who read the book. Professional men, industrial workers, farmers, all have a vital interest in this subject, as he elucidates it. MAN'S BIRTHRIGHT deserves a wide reading.

For Our Younger Readers

More than two thousand and fifty years ago one of the greatest philosophers of all the ages reached down across the centuries this message to the children of to-day:

What does any one gain by telling a lie? He is not believed when he tells the truth.—Aristotle (384-322 B.C.)

A Cross-Country Sailboat

By the Boy Who Made It

I HAD read about the beach-mobiles used on the Florida coast. They are built like ice-boa'ts with a sail, except that they have wheels instead of runners. So I set to work to make something similar to carry me swiftly over our smooth country roads, with the result shown in this picture.

The framework is made of seven fence pickets; the mast is two rake handles spliced together and heavily wound with wire. The gaff to which the upper end of the sail is fastened is the handle of an old box broom and the boom is made of common variety of broom-sticks also spliced.

Mother gave me a sheet which I cut up for the mainsail. The forward wheel with which I steer is the front wheel of a bicycle with the fork left on. The axle between the rear wheels is a bar of iron which cost fifteen cents, and the pulley by which I raise and lower the sail cost five cents. A saw, a hammer, a brace and bit and a screw-driver were the only tools I used. On a fair, breezy day with the wind in the right direction, I can go long distances on my Dandy Flyer. Once it started away with only my little sister on it, and I had to run with all my might to catch it, it sails so swiftly, and father says, "Joe Conway, you wouldn't be without your overland sailboat for all the red beans on the hop vine."

A Cross-Country Sailboat
Any Boy Can Make One

Fifteen Hundred Boy Athletes

UPWARDS of six hundred schoolboys entered the famous Marathon Race in New York City a year ago and Tewanama, a full-blooded Hopi Indian, won the championship in 69:16, thereby setting a new world standard in athletics. This year fifteen hundred boys ran the New York Marathon and Louis Scott of Paterson, N. J., covered the given distance in 68:28, thereby cutting forty-eight seconds off Tewanama's record, and once again the world's standard was raised. So runs the story of progress and success through everything. Standards are never fixed, they are ever movable, and always they move onward, upward.

It was a thrilling sight. All on a bright May morning, thirty lines of schoolboys, fifty abreast, every runner high-strung, alert and in good trim; at the crack of a pistol starting for a goal twelve miles away, each boy eager to raise the world's record. Ten thousand voices shouted, "They're off!" and a million more along the way cheered the best runners as they shot to the front, and still more at the goal shouted, "Good boy! good boy!" to the winner as he breasted the tape. The time limit of the race was two hours and fifteen minutes. Every boy that "arrived" within that time won a medal, but only one breasted the tape first and raised the standard of the world's championship.

The best of these races is that they do not end with the final running. They start thousands of boys over all the country in courses of training that include temperance, out-of-door exercise, sound discipline of body and mind and rigid cultivation of moral and mental well-being. Thrilled with the spirit of their own physical strength these boys are fitted in endurance and courage. Not only in the field of athletics but in every walk of life they are more apt to raise the world's standards and be the strong men to win the race.

Little Members of the Family

IN LONDON, where one of the most luxuriant and beautiful parks in the world, the Kensington Gardens, is a vast playground for little children; the fairies' own month of May was celebrated this year with a rare gift. A statue of Peter Pan, the boy who would not grow up, prettily lilting on an ancient tree-trunk and blowing his pipe, which brings the birds and squirrels and field-mice out to listen, was set up in a single night, and when the little children came next day to play they believed that the beautiful image of the little boy who plays with them at make-believe was left by the fairy-folk themselves. And who would be so sadly grown up as to tell them any different?

The statue, presented by Mr. J. M. Barrie, author of the story, Peter Pan, is of exquisite beauty. The inscription is: "Peter Pan, Friend of the Fairies and Little Children."

A Lucky Curve Tube Refuses to Leak because Curved

A STRAIGHT feed tube always holds some ink, even when the pen is upright.

And when the heat of the body —98 degrees—reaches the pen in your vest pocket, the air in the pen gets heated and expands up through the inky feed tube. This expanding air pushes the ink up and out under the pen point; daubs it over the writing end of pen—and all over your fingers when you remove cap to write.

But the Parker feed tube, as you see in this X-Ray picture, curves and touches the barrel. That touch creates Capillary Attraction, which sucks all the ink down out of the feed tube before the air expands and goes up.

Capillary Attraction is the force that makes a sponge absorb water, etc.

A curved feed tube in your fountain pen, touching the barrel, will always prevent leaking. The Parker is the only fountain pen containing a curved feed tube.

Never a scratch, skip or blot, when you write with a Parker. The Parker Spear Head Ink Controller makes the ink flow uniformly from the polished Iridium points of the 14k gold pens.

Standard style Parker Lucky Curve Pens $1.50 to $250 according to size and ornamentation.

MORTGAGE BONDS

A VERY large proportion of the invested savings of this country, as distinguished from speculative and commercial holdings, is invested in some form of mortgage bonds, yet it is doubtful if very many bondholders have ever read the closely engraved script which constitutes a bond so as to know really what that bond represents. They know in a general way that twice a year an interest coupon is to be cut from the bond and deposited in their bank account, and that if need arises the bond can be sold and money raised on it and that it forms a very conservative and convenient method for investing funds. But what the origin and history of the bond or what real security it gives the holder, does not as a rule interest them except in those unfortunate cases where the company issuing the bond fails to pay the interest coupon and there is a default on the bond.

A Bond Defined

A typical bond transaction can be briefly summarized as follows: Suppose the directors of a railroad company decide to build an additional branch to some growing town, feeling that in time the passenger and freight traffic over this proposed branch will be profitable to the stockholders of the railroad, and they therefore decide to appeal to the stockholders of the company, who are really the owners of the company and can be considered as an immense partnership, for permission to issue $1,000,000 of bonds, say one thousand bonds at $1,000 apiece, to raise money to pay for rails, cars, equipment and workmen for the building and operation of the branch. Notices are mailed to all stockholders that on a certain day at the office of the company a special meeting of the stockholders will be held to authorize the directors to place a mortgage on the company's property and to issue bonds thereunder. It must be understood that a bond is simply an obligation to pay a sum named therein on a certain day and is secured by the mortgage. It is just as necessary to get the permission of the necessary majority of the stockholders of the company in order to mortgage the company's property as it is to get the owner of a farm to sign a mortgage to cover that farm. Aside from the fact that the law allows, generally, a majority of the stockholders to decide these matters for the company, the railroad is as much the property of the stockholders as the farm is the property of the farmer.

If, then, the majority of the stockholders required assent to the placing of the mortgage, the directors of the company, through its officers, have a mortgage drawn in which they make some trust company, as trustee, the mortgagee for the benefit of the future bondholders. The mortgage is a lengthy printed document, and it would obviously be impossible to issue one to each person who may thereafter lend money to the company, under the mortgage, by buying one or more of its bonds. For purposes of convenience, then, the trustee is selected to represent all the bondholders, and stand in their place so far as dealings with the railroad company under the mortgage are concerned. The mortgage is thus called a trust mortgage, and one thousand bonds are printed and sold to the public, we will say, for $1,000 apiece, and the holder of each of these bonds, the real lender, has an interest or share in the mortgage to the extent of the bond he holds just as though the mortgage ran to him directly. The trustee is simply a convenient agent for all of them.

The bonds, besides being a promise to pay $1,000 each at the maturity thereof, recite in short and general terms the main provision of the more elaborate mortgage to which they refer, and which is held by the trustee. Attached to each bond is a series of coupons bearing date generally six months apart through the years up to the time the mortgage principal falls due, and also reciting the amount of interest each coupon calls for. If, then, the mortgage is a fifty-year 6 per cent. mortgage, with interest payable semi-annually, say on January 1 and July 1 of each year, there will be one hundred coupons attached to each bond, each coupon being good for $30 on the interest date stamped thereon, if presented to the trustee to which the mortgage runs. The trustee, of course, only guarantees to pay these coupons if the railroad company supplies it with the necessary funds for that purpose on or before the interest days specified.

Sinking Fund Bonds

Let us presume, now, that the bond is what is called a "sinking fund" bond. This means that by the terms of the mortgage under which the bond is given, the railroad company must set aside each year a certain amount from its earnings, so that, when the fifty years expire and the $1,000,000 principal of the mortgage falls due, the railroad will be able to pay it off. Sometimes, too, the mortgage gives the railroad the privilege of paying off and retiring a certain number of bonds before the expiration of the fifty years. The bonds to be thus retired are generally chosen by lot. If, therefore, the railroad proves immediately successful, the bonds may be all paid off and the mortgage satisfied before the fifty years expire.

A "gold bond" is simply a bond of which the principal and interest are payable in gold. This is to prevent payment, at any future time, in a depreciated currency, and is considered additional security for the bondholder. Of course, gold is not actually paid unless the bondholder demands it. A "first mortgage" bond is one which has no other lien ahead of it on the property mortgaged. It is the highest form of bond security, and consequently generally bears a lower rate of interest than "second" or "third mortgage" bonds, although the latter may be perfectly safe forms of investment.

Bonds Easily Converted

We have seen therefore what the main features of a "fifty-year first mortgage, six per cent. sinking fund gold bond" are. There are, of course, a great variety of mortgage bonds. They are issued in denominations from $10 to $1,000, and by companies engaged in all kinds of enterprises, but in their general features they differ little from one another. They are considered a safe form of investment if they cover valuable property, and are issued by responsible companies.

In case of default in the payment of principal or interest, the mortgage which secures them is foreclosed in much the same way as any other mortgage, except that the trustee forecloses for all the bondholders, instead of each bondholder for himself. They are safer than investments in the stock of the company issuing them, for they must be paid in full, principal and interest when due, before any stockholder can obtain the principal his stock represents, or any dividends thereon. They are convenient in that they are generally payable to bearer, and delivery gives title to both bond and coupon, and they can thus be freely bought and sold.

They furnish a quick method of raising money for their holders, for banks will loan money on bonds of recognized value. Such of them as are listed and traded in on the various stock markets or boards of trade of the country can, generally, be turned into cash at their full market value on a day's notice. In short, they form one of the most efficient and practical devices of modern finance for enabling the promoters of legitimate enterprises to borrow money and the thrifty citizen to invest his funds in a secure and profitable manner. DAVID PAINE.

Railway Equipment Obligations

Railway Equipment Obligations because of their fundamental soundness have become a very popular form of investment security. They combine in a high degree the three requisites of a good investment—security, marketability, and liberal income.

We have prepared a booklet describing the more important issues of the principal railroads, and will be pleased to mail a copy to you upon request.

Serve This Dish

At Our Cost, Madam

Serve It Tonight

We Pay the Grocer

We propose this to you, Mrs. Housewife.

Go buy at your grocer's—for 15 cents—a package of Puffed Rice. Take with you the coupon printed on this page.

Then the grocer will give you—at our expense—a 10-cent package of Puffed Wheat.

Serve the Puffed Rice for breakfast—in cream, or mixed with fruit.

But serve the Puffed Wheat—like bread or crackers—in cold, rich milk.

Serve it for luncheon or supper, between meals or at bedtime.

Learn how the crisp, porous, nut-like grains taste in a bowl of milk.

Prof. Anderson's Supper

These curious foods — Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice—were invented by Professor Anderson.

Millions of dishes every month are served on morning tables.

And never was a breakfast so enticing.

But summer is coming, and a summer delight is Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice in milk.

The grains are as crisp as crackers—four times as porous as bread.

They melt in the mouth like snowflakes. They are whole-grain foods.

A hundred times in the coming hot weather you'll want this delightful dish.

So we gladly buy one package for you—to let you find it out.

Foods Shot from Guns

Each grain is puffed by an internal steam explosion.

The grains are sealed up in bronze-steel guns. Then the guns are revolved for sixty minutes in a heat of 550 degrees.

The moisture in the grain is turned to steam by this terrific heat. When the guns are unsealed that steam explodes.

All the granules of grain are literally blasted to pieces, so digestion can instantly act. That was the main object of the inventor.

The grains are puffed to eight times normal size, but the coats of the grain are not broken.

In every kernel a myriad cells are created, each surrounded by toasted walls.

The result is delicious, digestible grain—the most enticing cereals that you ever knew.

Like Toasted Nuts

These foods are served with sugar and cream—they are mixed with fruit—they are served in milk.

They taste like toasted nuts.

So girls use them in candy making.

Boys eat them dry, like peanuts, when at play.

Chefs use them in frosting cake, or to garnish a dish of ice cream. All because of their nut-like taste.

Good for Ten Cents

Our offer is this:

Buy from your grocer one package of Puffed Rice, price 15 cents.

Take this coupon with you, and the grocer will give you one package of Puffed Wheat.

We will pay the grocer ten cents for your package of Puffed Wheat.

Thus you get both these foods, and pay for only one.

This offer is made so you may try both of them—so you may mix them—and to induce you to try them in milk.

It means ten cents to you if you act now.

Cut out this coupon, lay it aside, and present it when you go to the store.

Open Markets in Great Favor

The Christian Herald's Readers Discuss the Most Practical Method of Reducing the Cost of Living

Dubuque's Famous Market Ready for Business at Seven A.M.

THAT the letters from the mayors of our leading cities, dealing with the open market as a means of reducing the cost of living, have struck a popular keynote is evident from the large number of communications now pouring in upon us from readers in many States. Extracts from some of these are given below. In the main, the writers speak from personal experience. Some are farmers or truck-raisers, while others are consumers; but all agree, with one solitary exception, that the establishment of public markets, where they do not now exist, is greatly to be desired.

In Dubuque, Ia., as several correspondents write, the plan has met with remarkable success. One reader sends a photograph of a market in Dubuque at which the producer and consumer can meet, and where both have the advantage of satisfactory prices without the intervention of the middleman.

Dubuque Has Famous Open Markets

Having read your article on city markets in the March 13 issue, I take pleasure in sending you herewith some very good views of Dubuque's famous markets. Of late many cities have sent representatives here to see our market, and La Crosse, Wis., and Des Moines, Ia., are going to start a market at once.

Saturday is always the largest market, and is the only evening market of the week. We have a market every day, but the greater number of farmers come on Saturday. The gardeners have a regular stand and pay by the year, while the farmers pay 10 cents each time they come. All kinds of fresh vegetables, meat, butter, eggs, chickens (live and dressed), meats of all kinds, milk and cream, and fruits are sold.

Even the coldest Saturday morning in winter, you will find plenty of butter, eggs, chickens, meats, sauerkraut and pickles of all kinds. Dubuque is proud of its market.

Being a reader of your paper for over twenty years, I am pleased to give you this information.

Dubuque, Ia. MISS Z. E. G.

A Retired Farmer's View of the Question

If every city of 5,000 could have a public market, and every large city a market house for every 10,000, where producer and consumer could come face to face twice a week, high prices could not exist. This would bring about honest competition and stimulate production. Then give us the parcels post, so that the producer could get his products to the city from a distance, and present conditions could not again occur. I am a retired farmer, 76 years old. I have been a member of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Family for many years. I lived near Zanesville, Ohio, for many years, where they have such a market, and know what it means to a city. M. ZIMMER.

Laziness Makes Living Difficult to Many

"What is the cause of the high cost of living, and what is its remedy?" It is easily answered: laziness; an aversion to produce; many more consumers than producers. The majority of young men want to loaf and play baseball, instead of cultivate the ground and raise fine stock. In this section, a young man marries and strikes for the city without salary and with very limited means, depending on "catch jobs" for a living. Put one-half the population of the cities out on farms, and let them raise corn, wheat, cattle, sheep, hogs, poultry, etc., instead of criminals, and in three years the problem will be satisfactorily solved.

A country cottage, with a farm and nice surroundings, is man's earthly paradise, provided his heart is right with God.

Pullman, W. Va. SUBSCRIBER.

A Farmer on the Cost of Living

The high cost of living is inequality of supply and demand and extravagance. The supply is inadequate to the yearly increase of the population and this is caused by the decrease of the cultivation of our farms, owing to higher wages demanded for labor. The air is filled with extravagance and extravagant ideas. Vanity Fair is forever alluring the majority of the boys and girls away from the farm. They think they must go into society, and spend all they can get to make an empty show.

The combination of cold storage plants helps to regulate the higher and uniform prices of to-day. It was not so fifty years ago.

Public Markets Would Be a General Blessing

When a resident of the South in the early sixties I was puzzled by the court charge of forestalling the market, i. e., buying of the farmers before they had reached the public market. I must regard public markets, then a feature of Southern cities, as the best means of forestalling the middleman, who undoubtedly is largely responsible for the prevalent high prices. They would be a boon to both producer and consumer. GEO. D. D.

Hampton Falls, N. H.

The Open Market the "Right Idea"

The public market idea seems to me to be the right thing. In a public market, prices would play up and down from the natural causes of supply and demand. I like to say "Amen" to good ideas. W. H. H.

The Great Gold Production a Prime Factor

The surplus of gold mined and coined within the last twenty years, until money is so plentiful that it has not the purchasing power it had 20 years ago, is the main cause of our high prices of living. The wonderful increase of gold has caused real estate to double its former value in twenty years, consequently the products of the soil as well as everything else have gone up in proportion. And this is not confined to the United States, but is felt in foreign countries also. E. S. C.

Says Farmers Are in the Hold-up Business

Detroit is a city of nearly or quite five hundred thousand people; it has on three sides of it a most productive farming district. There is a plentiful supply of all that the farm and garden and dairy can produce. The prices of all things in the city are abnormally high.

When butter and eggs are selling in the city from forty-eight cents for eggs and the same for good country butter, these same things can be purchased within thirty miles of the city for thirty or thirty-two cents. There are two

YOUR FLAG
FOR MEMORIAL DAY

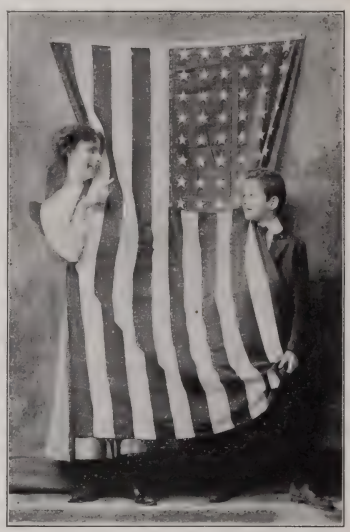
Every Christian Herald Family Should Have Its Own Flag. You Can Secure One Free

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has just made arrangements whereby it is enabled to offer a large American Flag, like the one in the illustration, to a limited number of its readers, without payment on their part of one cent.

Not a little hand-flag, understand, but a large-sized "Old Glory," bigger than the top of your dining-room table.

Here is an opportunity to keep faith with your patriotism. You will have use for a flag on every holiday for years to come, and you can also use it constantly for decorative purposes in public and private sociables, in the schoolhouse, in the church, and in the home.

Of course, you want a Flag for Memorial Day.



This is the smaller (4x6 feet) of the two flags offered. Compare size with the height of the children. The larger flag measures 5x8 feet.

Just think of being able to celebrate Memorial Day, Flag Day, the Fourth of July, with such a flag—real red, white and blue, right from the factory of the government flag-maker.

YOU PAY NO MONEY

At this time of the year THE CHRISTIAN HERALD usually puts forth an extraordinary effort to increase the number of members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. We can only do this with the help of the present members; YOU are one of these, and we know that you will help us. But we have no right to expect your good offices for nothing, so we make you the following offer:

The regular annual subscription price of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as you know, is $1.50. There are a number among your relations, friends or acquaintances who you know would be benefited by receiving THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. You can think of several in a few minutes, and it would be easy for you to get them to subscribe for a short trial period—say eight months.

YOUR FRIENDS WILL HELP YOU

Get one of your friends to subscribe to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for eight months, send us only one dollar for this subscription, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be mailed to the address in the United States or Canada furnished by you. In return for your trouble we will send you, absolutely without cost, a beautiful American Flag, and in addition we will send you, also without cost to you, a life-size facsimile of the Declaration of Independence, 26x31 inches—an exact duplicate in every way of the priceless document which was signed by the Fathers of our Country. This document should be in every patriotic home.

The above offer is for the 4x6 foot Flag shown in the illustration. Perhaps you would prefer a larger Flag—5x8 feet in size. To secure this size Flag, send us TWO eight months' subscriptions accompanied by two dollars, and we will send you this extra size "Old Glory."

A FLAG WITH YOUR OWN RENEWAL.—If you want a Flag with your own CHRISTIAN HERALD renewal, you may have the large 5x8 Flag and one year's subscription for only $2.40.

Or, you may have the 4x6 Flag and one year's CHRISTIAN HERALD subscription for only $2.

Memorial Day, but a few days off, makes our wonderful Flag offer particularly attractive to every loyal American heart, and you should take especial pride in securing one of these Flags for your home. Address ge markets in the city. They do not, how-r, in any way lower the cost of living, for the mers and others demand just as much as do merchants and often more. Last fall I ld purchase fresh eggs at any of the grocery res for eighteen cents. On the market they re charging twenty. Butter was selling n at twenty-four cents at the stores and on markets they charged thirty. The farmers d gardeners have become apt in the "hold-up siness" and seem experts in it.

Selfishness at the Bottom of the Trouble

I think one needful thing for an open market uld be a store building to protect produce m freezing storms and from thieving. Where en markets are used, some may not sell all one day, then it must be taken home or fall o some speculator's hands. Of course the fficulty in the way of any system is selfishness. usts and middlemen would or could be the t of institutions, if they would work for the nefit of all. A producers' or consumers' mpany might be as hard on the public as any ner. A. B. W.

Ohio Farmers Sell to Middlemen

We have open markets in Cincinnati six days the week. I have been selling tomatoes, ns, peas, potatoes, berries and apples there quite a number of years. We put our pro-ce up in bushel boxes and barrels. We never ail—never sell less than a bushel to one rson. We sell almost entirely to peddlers d grocerymen. Our produce goes to some ddleman, who retails it to the consumer. actically all of the farmers sell to the mid-men. They cannot retail if they try. There e more huckster and peddler wagons than rmers' wagons in the market always. Those ve taken the retail trade because they go gularly to the same place at every market. ey often buy our produce and sell it again e same morning, sometimes at retail, some-nes at wholesale.

The people in Cincinnati, where there is a rket every week day in some part of the city, e complaining loudly about the high cost of ing and are seeking for remedy; while the rmer is complaining just as loudly about low ices. Sometimes we get good prices; but a od part of our produce sells below the cost of production. I have known tomatoes to sell for a dollar a bushel one morning and for forty cents the next. In such cases no doubt the consumer paid the dollar both mornings.

In the midst of it all the cities are full of idle men, the young men are all leaving the farms because they see nothing ahead of them but hard work, and when we want an extra hand we cannot find him. A. L.

Amelia, Ohio.

A Housewife's Idea of High Price Remedies

Shut up the trusts and all who would monopolize and bring hardship and restrictions on others in their line of trade. Pass a law that no restrictions shall be placed on the public market, except that no meats, eggs, or provisions that have been packed away in cold storage shall be sold there. Pass a law that farmers and those bringing in meats, eggs and produce to sell shall have no restrictions imposed upon them, in the interest of monopoly.

Is it any wonder that so many are affected with diseases, when you see the putrid meats and long-stored products that people are obliged to buy or go without? Also those living alone, who always buy small pieces, unless they are rich cannot have a fresh piece cut out for them. A public market with good, fresh meats and produce we would hail with joy.

Lowell, Mass. MRS. O. D. C.

We Should Dignify Productive Labor

More than half a century of an ever-increasing deluge of fiction from the press, together with countless representations on the stage, always with characters drawn from the ranks of non-producers, have filled the minds of men and women with wrong ideals. Productive labor is come to be looked down upon—menial. It is natural to strive after one's ideal. The result is, the world to-day is overrun with drones. Workers they may be, but non-producers. A list of chosen non-producing occupations would fill many pages of your paper. Let any one try to make such a list, and it will be seen how endless it is. All these eat, and are clothed. Is it any wonder that the cost of living is high?

Not till a stop is put on the kind of fiction which is in vogue can there be hope for the formation of correct ideals. When productive labor gets its proper place in the minds of people, then, and not till then, will the tide gradually turn. R. S.

resident McCormick Explains

SUIT has been filed under the Sherman Law in St. Paul, Minn., by the Federal Gov-nment, directed against the present form of ganization of the International Harvester mpany. This proceeding is the outcome of e inability on the part of the government's presentatives and the company to agree on a iendly plan for the company's dissolution. Mr. rus H. McCormick, president of the Inter-tional Harvester Company, has issued a state-ent pointing out wherein his company differs om the so-called "trust" cases heretofore de-ded under the Sherman Law. His company as organized in 1902 "for the purpose of secur-g economy in the manufacture and sale of rvesting machinery, and of increasing the reign trade. It had no water in its capitaliza-on, and it has earned only a reasonable return its capital—less than seven per cent. yearly the average. The prices of its machines are w substantially the same as in 1902, notwith-anding an increase of 15 per cent. in raw aterial prices and 30 per cent. in wages. The mpany has caused a large saving to American rmers in the cost of agricultural implements. has increased the foreign trade in agricultural plements fourfold in nine years; its foreign les in 1911 were over $42,000,000. It has not ld cheaper abroad than at home. Its treat-ent of its customers, its employees, its agents nd its competitors has been in accord with the ghest standard of ethics and honorable busi-ss methods. To the farmer it has given tter service and better machines; to agents nd dealers, a less hazardous and fluctuating usiness; and to its employees higher wages, nproved and sanitary working conditions, in-rance against sickness, accident and old age, nd a share in the profits." The charges of isconduct found in the bill have been met and isproved in other cases; and Mr. McCormick elieves they will again fail. The Supreme ourt of Missouri, in a suit in which these harges were fully gone into, found that "the nternational Harvester Company has not used s power to oppress or injure the farmers who re its customers," and that "the price of arvesting machines has not increased in pro-ortion to the increased cost of construction or he increased merit of the machines.

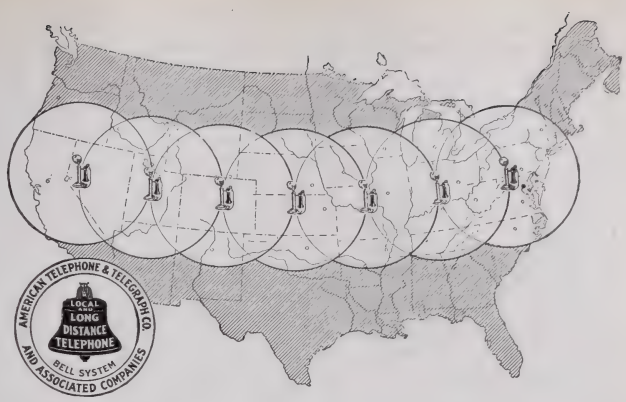
Mr. McCormick adds that six years ago the ompany asked for its investigation by the overnment, and opened its books and records or inspection, and furnished all information equested. No suggestion of any change in its usiness methods has been made to it by the overnment at any time. The filing of the bill vill in no way interfere with the company's arrying on its business.

Among the Workers

—FORTY-TWO NEW members were received into the Glens Falls, N. Y., Presbyterian Church at the April communion; twenty-two on confession of faith. The present pastor, Rev. Dr. Daniel Hoffman Martin, came to its pastorate about four years ago. The contributions for church support and benevolences have increased over a hundred per cent.

—THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR UNION of New Mexico is trying to rally the Christian forces of the State in opposition to the Johnson-Flynn prizefight, which is now definitely announced to take place in Las Vegas, July 4. The House of Representatives has passed a bill legalizing prizefighting up to forty-five rounds by a vote of 28 to 18. Governor McDonald is opposed to the prizefight. The question is whether the Senate can be rallied to defeat the bill, and if not, if the governor will have the strength of his convictions and veto it. State workers throughout the country are invited to send in their protest because of the demoralizing influence of the moving pictures, which will follow the prizefight and multiply its debasing influence. Protests should be addressed to the Governor, President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, Santa Fe, N. M.

—THE OUTDOOR EVANGELISTIC Campaign to be conducted by the National Bible Institute of New York during the summer of 1912 opened on Monday, April 29, with a noon meeting at Madison Square. The outdoor work of the National Bible Institute began at Madison Square six years ago, the president of the institute, Mr. Don O. Shelton, leading the first meeting. Since then the outdoor work has grown tremendously, over eleven hundred meetings being held last summer. The work for this season will be under the supervision of David Hughes, the Welsh evangelist, who had charge last year, and practically the same plan of operation will be followed, specially selected men being placed in charge of the different centers, with pastors of the city churches and laymen delivering short Gospel messages to the crowds collected on the streets. The Madison Square meeting will be the only one conducted for a few days until the weather becomes settled. This meeting will start promptly every day in the week, with the exception of Saturday and Sunday, at 12.15. The National Bible Institute has just closed its fifth financial year, and is entirely free of debt. During the past year $31,455 was received in voluntary contributions. Twenty-four hundred evangelistic meetings were conducted in the open air and in the four Gospel halls conducted by the institute. The School for Christian Workers, conducted by the institute, had the largest enrolment in its history.



The Chain of Communication

EACH Bell Telephone is the center of the system. This system may be any size or any shape, with lines radiating from any subscriber's telephone, like the spokes of a wheel, to the limits of the subscriber's requirements, whether ten miles or a thousand.

Somewhere on the edge of this subscriber's radius is another who requires a radius of lines stretching still further away. On the edge of this second subscriber's radius is still a third, whose requirements mean a further extension of the lines, and so on.

This endless chain of systems may be illustrated by a series of overlapping circles. Each additional subscriber becomes a new center with an extended radius of communication, reaching other subscribers.

However small the radius, the step-by-step extension from neighbor to neighbor must continue across the continent without a stopping place, until the requirements of every individual have been met.

There can be no limit to the extension of telephone lines until the whole country is covered. There can be no limit to the system of which each Bell telephone is the center, up to the greatest distance that talk can be carried.

Because these are the fundamental needs of a nation of telephone users, the Bell System must provide universal service.

PRAYER AND ALMS*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WE ARE still with Jesus on the Mount of Beatitudes. How small the company sitting at his feet, compared with those in all the world—upwards of twenty-six millions—who are to-day learning his spoken words through the Sunday school lesson! Jesus warns his listeners against being hypocrites, and teaches them how to be true to God and man. What a thing is a hypocrite! God did not make him, the devil did not make him; he is self-made!

Jesus said on the mountain that day, "Ye shall not be as hypocrites, for they love to stand and pray in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men." It is one thing to be seen of God in prayer (when men pray in secret, in their hearts), and quite another thing when they pray in public, and not at all in their hearts. But this does not mean that public prayer is wrong, for in the Bible gatherings for prayer are commanded and commended. Alas! the hypocrite sometimes takes part in the prayer meetings! Men may not discern that he is a hypocrite, but God knows. There is another sort of hypocrite—one who prays in secret, and is unwilling to make a public profession of his faith in Jesus Christ. But that day on the mountain Jesus talked to his hearers about the proud hypocrites who wanted to seem better than they really were. By way of forceful illustration Jesus compared them with men who were professional trumpet-blowers, sent throughout the land to carry a proclamation from the rulers to the people. Generally rams' horns were used. The comparison made by Jesus is all the more striking when we think he meant rams' horns, rather than the silver trumpets that were sometimes used, because the rams' horns gave out bellowing sounds, totally unlike the musical ring of the silver trumpets.

The Hypocrite's Prayer

There could be no music in the false words of the hypocrites (the Pharisees) even though they prayed. They were far from being silver-tongued. It was nothing against them that they stood while they prayed, for that was the ancient Jewish custom; but Jesus recognized that they stood to be seen of men, rather than to do reverence before God. It was against them that they used high-sounding, meaningless words, "vain repetitions" Jesus called them. That was the part of their blowing condemned by Jesus. What wonder that one of the hearers, probably one of the apostles, was led to say: "Lord, teach us to pray" (Luke 11: 1). How grand was the response of Christ when he said, "After this manner pray ye: Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever, Amen." This prayer has gone to the ends of the earth in the fulfilment of the prophecy that his kingdom should extend from sea to sea. In no language into which it is translated does it lose its truth and beauty, but there is a strain of tenderness in the Scotch version of a hundred years ago that we do not find in all tongues:

"Father o' us a', abidin' aboon! Thy name be holie. Lat thy reign begin! Lat thy wull be dune, baith in yirth and heeven. Gie us ilka day our needfu feudin. And forgie us a' oor ill-deeds, as we een forgae thae wha did us ill; and lat us no be siftit; but save us frae the Ill-Ane! For the croon is thine ain, and the micht and the glorie, for evir and evir, Amen."

We give it here particularly for the light it throws upon the words we usually hear: "Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors," or "forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us." "Ill deeds" are certainly plainer to us than "debts" or "trespasses." If we try to live it, it will be plainer still.

"Will you ask my pardon?" said a master to his servant, with whom he had disputed. The answer was a surly negative. "Then I will ask yours," said the master, knowing that some one must always be the first to give in, and meeting his servant more than half way with forgiveness and peace. What heart could withstand such a step toward reconciliation?

In the Scotch words "Let us no be siftit," there is reference to what Jesus said to Peter: "Satan hath desired to have you that he may sift you as wheat; but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not" (Luke 22: 31, 32). What a precious thought is here; that we are delivered from evil through the prayers of Christ, and so escape being "siftit" by Satan!

All of the Scotch words may not be understood at the first reading, but let each word be compared with the words of the prayer familiar to us, and its sweetness will grow upon us.

Daniel Marsh's Comment

There could not be a more beautiful comment upon the Lord's Prayer than that given by the late Daniel Marsh. We quote the whole of it, though it may seem somewhat lengthy:

Our Father. By right of creation. By gracious adoption.

Which art in heaven. The home of thy angels. The seat of thy glory.

Hallowed be thy name. By the thoughts of our hearts. By the words of our lips. By the actions of our lives.

Thy kingdom come. Of providence to protect us. Of grace to refine us. Of glory to crown us.

Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Submissively, cheerfully, and, finally, perfectly.

Give us this day our daily bread. Of temporal things for our bodies. Of spiritual things for our souls.

And forgive us our trespasses. Against the precepts of thy law, and the grace of thy Gospel.

As we forgive those who trespass against us. In imitation of thy love and to the glory of true religion.

And lead us not into temptation. Of such riches, honors or pleasures as might war against the soul.

But deliver us from evil. Of Satan to deceive us. Of sin to defile us.

For thine is the kingdom. Of providence and grace.

The power. To establish it.

And the glory. Of all good.

Forever and ever. Amen. So let it be. So is it. So it shall be.

Alms in Secret

Jesus on the mountain had something to say about the hypocrite's way of giving alms and of fasting, for the way in which the Pharisees had been doing it was very like the sound of a trumpet, for they were always very careful to be seen of men when they did such pious acts. "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth," said Jesus. He was talking illustratively, meaning that we should not with a flourish of hands or of trumpets blazon our goodness before the world.

A little girl had been very naughty. Her grandmother had a very solemn talk with her, and told her that it was not enough to ask the forgiveness of her loving friends, but that she should also ask God's forgiveness. On the following day the grandmother asked her if she had asked God to forgive her. The child replied, "Yes." "What did you say to him?" She answered: "Oh, that is a secret between him and me." At first thought that may seem a pert reply, but as we think more about it, we shall recognize a sacred feeling that should not be intruded upon. It would be well for all of us if we had more secrets with God; it would make us more genuine. Particularly this should be so in our benevolent gifts.

Sunday School Lesson

The True Satisfaction

Some people may find satisfaction in having others praise them for their generous giving, but it is a poor recompense compared with that which God gives in the sweet satisfaction which fills the generous soul. Jean Ingelow reminds us that we shall not have any property to give away in the next world, and she sagaciously adds: "Let us therefore get our fill of giving in this life." In a recent year one hundred and twenty Kiowa Indians gave $1,066 to missions. That was about an average of eighty dollars and fifty cents each. Compare with this the sad fact that the gift of missions in our churches does not amount to more than one half-dollar per member. We have not heard that the Kiowas felt any great pride in their generosity, or that they took any steps to publish it; but the fact was given by the general secretary of the Missionary Association, Dr. Chivers.

NOTE.—We wish to correct an error that appeared in our lesson for April 7, 1912, in regard to the appearances of Jesus after his resurrection. The reference, Acts 1: 10, was a wrong citation on our part and should have read Rev. 1: 10-22, and that should have been noted as the fourteenth appearance.—W. F. C.

Anecdotes of Stead

MANY pleasing reminiscences of the late W. T. Stead, who perished on the Titanic, are published in the English weeklies. Dr. Henry Lunn, Stead's lifelong friend and literary co-laborer, tells this characteristic incident: "I received from him one Christmas one of his little books, and in it was printed, 'To the companion of my Rosary,' and then followed my name and his signature. I asked him what it meant, and he said: 'I keep a list of all the people with whom I have been brought closely in contact, and each of them is down in my calendar for the day when he first crossed my path, and on that day I pray for him.' Thus closely did he unite himself with all those who to-day are mourning the loss of one of the best and truest friends they have ever known."

And another friend of the dead journalist relates this incident: "Toward the end of his life he abandoned a lucrative position on the press for conscientious reasons. 'Can you afford to do this?' a friend asked him. 'Well,' he said, 'you see, I have a very wealthy partner.' 'Who is he?' 'God Almighty,' was the reply."

Answered Prayers

Mrs. E. R., Tamaroa, Ill. "I wish to make known that God answered my prayer."

Mrs. E. F. R., East Orange, N. J. "I wish to acknowledge an answer to prayer which has brought me great happiness."

Mrs. D. D. R., Tullahoma, Tenn. "I want to acknowledge God's goodness to me in answering prayer. He has restored my dear son to health again."

Mrs. J. F. P., Portland, Ore. "I wish to acknowledge the love of our Lord in answering our prayers for the healing of the body in one case, and the healing of the spirit in another. Praise his holy name."

Notice how the diagonal stroke idea is creeping into safety razor advertising?

You tilt the blade like this

You shave as you've always shaved, like this

But it isn't creeping into the razors—that's the trouble. No use telling men they can acquire this stroke. It's like asking them to learn the barber's trade.

But the diagonal stroke is the thing; all razor makers admit it. It is not a matter of preference, it is the only way to get a real shave.

And the way to get this stroke is to use the razor that gives it—the Young

Questions and Answers

M. B. J., Deer Lodge, Tenn. Where did William Carey labor as a missionary?

William Carey was the first Baptist missionary to India. He was appointed by the Baptists of England, and began his work in India in 1794. He founded the mission at Serampur, and was professor of Oriental languages in the College of Fort William. His life was one of heroism and usefulness; he edited twenty-four translations of the Bible, and his name is revered as one of the founders of modern missions.

I. H. W., Scranton, Pa. 1. What is the velocity of the earth, its area, weight and age? 2. When are we nearer the sun—winter or summer?

1. Velocity, 18 1-5 miles per second; area, 197,000,000 square miles; weight, 6,000,000,000,000,000,000,000 tons (six sextillions of tons); age, from 50 million to 150 million years, according to modern scientists. 2. Three million miles nearer in winter than in summer.

A Reader, Woodbine, Ia. 1. What passages in the Bible state or imply the equality of man and woman? 2. How long had the Manchus governed China before the present revolution? 3. Is there more than one political party in China now?

1. The Bible nowhere states positively that men and women are equal. Many facts, however, of the Bible message would tend to support the theory that they are equal. God's commands are recorded and his promises given to the human race, and men and women share equally in the obligations and the blessings; chosen women in Old Testament times delivered the messages and wrought the tasks of God, while in New Testament times Christ chose women for his friends and the early church recognized them as coworkers in the new kingdom. Paul does say in Gal. 3: 28 that there is no longer "male and female" in Christian fellowship; but in other passages, like Eph. 5: 22-24, Col. 3: 18, Titus 2: 5, etc., he states that wives should submit themselves and be obedient to their husbands. As has been pointed out in earlier issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Paul's injunctions about women must be read in the light of the times and localities in which and to which he wrote and need not be taken as literal commands for a future age. But even Paul gave, in Eph. 5: 25-33, the highest, most generous and most beautiful estimate of the ideal relation between husband and wife. 2. From 1644 A.D., 268 years. 3. There are two parties at present, the Republicans, or supporters of the new order of things, and the Royalists, or those who are working to restore the old regime.

J. P. S., Tabor, N. C. Please give me your interpretation of II. Cor. 2: 15-16.

In verse 14 Paul speaks of the knowledge of God as a fragrance which his messengers carry about from place to place. In verse 16 he declares that the messengers themselves are a fragrance, that is, their holy lives and their true messages gratify God as a pleasing fragrance gratifies a human person. But the pure life and true words of a messenger of God are distasteful to people who choose evil, to people who remain wilfully in the way of destruction, while to those who are being saved their lives and words are pleasing and attractive. The words of truth when rejected deepen the condemnation of those who reject them, while they help toward eternal life those who accept.

W. P., Eureka, Mont. To what school of medicine did Luke the evangelist belong?

Luke is believed to have been of Gentile descent, a native of Antioch, a freedman or the son of a freedman, had been well educated, besides being specially trained in the profession of medicine, according to the Roman method of the time. Usually people of inferior rank were the physicians of those days. One writer says, "Luke practiced at Antioch" and infers that he must have been familiar with the medical science taught in the great nearby schools of Cilicia and Alexandria, as well as the Western views of medical science. Possibly he had been a pupil of Aretæus, the principal medical authority in Tarsus, whose school may be called the Asiatic-Greek. Aretæus was an authority on heart, lung, nerve, stomach and liver diseases, and wrote many medical books. Those were the days of leeches and blood-letting, and abundant drugs. A catalogue of the medicines of those days, simple and compound (one has been preserved by the Sydenham Society) was a formidable-looking affair.

M. M., Indianapolis, Ind. What is the annual armament budget of the leading nations at the present time?

It is distributed as follows:

S. F. H., Eldora, Ia., calls attention to the fact that in the treaty between Mexico and the United States, concluded over sixty years ago, there is a provision that any future war which may break out between the two countries "shall be conducted on Christian principles." This is an interesting reminder of the fact that, even in those comparatively early days, the principle of arbitration was probably in view, as affording a basis for the adjustment of any difficulties arising between the two countries. As for a war "conducted on Christian principles," it would be an anomaly. War itself is in direct conflict with the Gospel, which teaches that men should love one another. At the same time, it was probably in the mind of the drafters of the treaty that, in the event of actual warfare, the laws of civilization should govern, thus minimizing casualties, avoiding needless slaughter, excluding a resort to extreme and sanguinary methods and conducting the campaign on humane principles as far as possible.

J. E. P., Baring, Ore. In a sermon I heard a short time ago the preacher stated that Gipsy Smith was paid $12,000 by fifteen preachers for coming to Chicago to save sinners. Can this be true?

We have referred the foregoing letter to Mr. Albany R. Smith, son and agent of Gipsy Smith, who sends us the following reply:

"You may positively make the following statement over my name: That my father is the accredited evangelist of the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches of England and Wales; that they make all his engagements and pay him a yearly salary of less than $4,000.

L. H. H., Dayton, O. Are the trees of California the largest in the world?

The California trees are greatest in girth, but not in height. Some of them are from 250 to 375 feet tall and from 60 to 110 feet in circumference. The tallest trees are a species of Australian eucalyptus, reaching a height of 480 feet.

B. A. L., Eufaula, Wash. In the Bible it is said, "In the last days, it shall come to pass that old men shall dream dreams and young men shall see visions." Does it mean that this class of dreams is of a revealing character? Did God discontinue this method at any epoch, or does it yet exist?

The passage in Joel 2: 28, 29, is part of a chapter that is full of promised blessings to Israel in the "last days," when God would have pity on his penitent people. The outpouring of the Spirit was realized at Pentecost. The promise of dreams and visions also came to pass in New Testament times, not merely in the case of a privileged few (as prophets and seers), but among people of all ranks (see Acts 21: 9 and I. Cor. 11: 5). Ananias had a vision of Saul (Acts 9: 10); Paul had a vision of the man of Macedonia (Acts 16: 9); Peter had a vision on the housetop at Joppa, etc. The three modes whereby (in the Old Testament) God revealed his will to men were prophecy, dreams, and visions (see Num. 12: 6). This promise in Joel was that God's manifestation to his people would be more full, more wonderful, more intimate and more miraculous than before. In our own day, if we seek the Lord diligently, he will reveal his will to us just as surely as he has done to others in the past.

The Completed Peace Palace at The Hague, Holland

THE Great Peace Palace, which has been presented to the nations of the world by Andrew Carnegie, is now completed and stands ready for occupation at The Hague. As has been stated before in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, this wonderful building, which cost $12,500,000, contains great audience chambers, salons, corridors, council-rooms and halls, as well as complete suites for the accommodation of distinguished guests and every modern convenience and beauty that limitless expenditure could provide. With the agitation for a permanent Board of Consultation, or at least a Court of International Law, there is a suggestion current that the new Peace Palace become the permanent home of such a board, which would be made up of famous jurists and statesmen from the great countries of the world.

W. B. R., Ottumwa, Ia. The Dives and Lazarus story is a parable and intended to illustrate the contrasting condition of rich and poor. Lazarus is an imaginary representative of those saints whom the world spurns and passes by, while Dives is a type of the purse-proud, selfish rich, who have little consideration for any outside of their own immediate circle. There is an old tradition which states that the parable was based on real personages, and that the rich man was named Dobruk, and lived in Jerusalem, while Lazarus was a well-known mendicant—a familiar figure about the streets. One authority gives the rich man the name of Nimeusis. The general opinion, however, is, as already stated, that the illustration is a parable pure and simple.

W. D. A., Naugatuck, Conn. In the passages you quote, we must simply take the Scriptural narrative as it stands. There are many cases in which explication is difficult and theory or controversy useless. There has certainly been a change in the pulpit attitude regarding eternal punishment. Preachers now teach more of the love of God than of divine justice and retribution; yet they do not wholly overlook the fate that awaits the impenitent sinner. We don't know the book to which you refer.

French Troops in the Moorish Quarter of Fez

The Sultan, Mulay Hafid

A Moorish Market Scene on the Road to Fez

MOROCCO'S REVOLT AGAINST FRANCE

GENERAL LYAUTEY FACES LONG CAMPAIGN OF SUBJUGATION AND CIVILIZATION

ALTHOUGH France has made such a signal success in the establishment and operation of her protectorate over Algiers she does not seem to have met with the same success in her more recently acquired territory of Morocco. Present conditions point to a long campaign before Morocco enjoys the same peace and commercial prosperity that is now found in Tunisia. On April 17 the majority of the Moorish army which formed the garrison at Fez mutinied, and set about killing their instructors and looting the Jewish quarter. It has been reported that twenty Europeans were cut to pieces before the French troops, who were encamped three miles from the city, could be notified and brought in to quell the disturbances. The rebels seized and killed two hundred or more Jews and forced a large number of others to seek refuge in the empty cages of the Sultan's menagerie. This outbreak of revolution was due to the reduction of the pay of the Shereefian troops in connection with the change of method of the distribution of rations. Recent despatches tell of several hostile demonstrations against French authority by different Moorish tribes and the report of a fierce engagement between Moors and French troops at El Maaziz, in which fifteen commissioned and non-commissioned officers, forty soldiers and fifteen civilians were slain and sixty-six men wounded, has been officially confirmed.

The attitude of the Sultan himself is giving much cause for anxiety. He seems to be in an indeterminate state of mind, vacillating between unpleasant alternatives. At one moment he threatens to abdicate, the next he announces that he wishes to go to Rabat, and thence to France. Premier Poincaré has telegraphed to M. Ragnault, the French minister at Fez, to do his utmost to keep the Sultan in his capital, inasmuch as a large force of belligerent Moors have made an encampment just outside the walls, and there is no doubt they are awaiting only the smallest provocation to make a demonstration. In the meantime General Lyautey, a distinguished soldier with a good record, has been appointed governor. He takes supreme command, superseding General Moinier, who has been in charge at the capital. The French troops are to be considerably increased. Three battalions of reinforcements, which General Moinier requested, are on their way, and in addition several warships have been ordered to cruise along the North African coast so as to be within quick striking distance.

France faces a difficult situation in Morocco. It is now a year since the occupation of the French began. In May, 1911, a forced march was made to Fez, and the French troops succeeded in saving the lives of the French and other Europeans there and in establishing French authority. That march was the turning point in the campaign and led to the recognition of a French protectorate. What changes have come in the situation to cause the recent revolt? This is the question the French are asking themselves, and which outsiders are also asking. When the Sultan, Mulay Hafid, signed the treaty with France, he stipulated with Minister Ragnault and with General Moinier that the fact of his having done so should not be made known until all the caids, that is, commanders of the Moorish fortresses, had been warned, but it is likely the news percolated through French sources into Morocco, causing the recent revolt of the Moorish tribesmen. Neither M. Ragnault nor General Moinier suspected anything wrong, being unaware of any plot, but the home authorities seem to have scented danger, for ministers freely expressed a feeling of uneasiness in regard to Moroccan affairs. The prime minister, M. Poincaré, wrote to War Minister Millerand to suggest that General Moinier should concentrate his troops, but the suggestion came too late. Before the concentration could be effected the outbreak of April 17 had brought matters to a climax. Scenes of wild riot, murder and confusion followed the first outbreak. How the revolt ended is not yet reported. A detachment of French troops swooped down on the band and the rebels were forced to give way. However, they are far from crushed and are only waiting their time to break forth afresh. One prominent French general is quoted as expressing the belief that it will take at least a dozen years for the French to subdue these wild Moroccan tribesmen and establish anything like order.

French Officers Questioning Two Moorish Rebels Just After Their Capture

A MEMORIAL DAY SERMON

UNFORGOTTEN HEROES

TEXT: "For the living know that they shall die: but the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten." Eccles. 9: 5

THIS is not the only time that a philosopher has generalized upon too small a basis of fact. The "Wisdom" to which our text gives expression finds for itself no deep foundation in the eternal realities of spiritual life. Rather, it is the drab pessimism born of exclusive acquaintance with the exterior facts of human experience. It has not stood with Moses in awful reverence before the bush of flame with God; nor faced the foe with Joshua, conscious of the invincibility of faith; nor dreamed with David under the stars blazing like beacons to light his soul to heaven; nor has it been touched by the enraptured vision of St. Paul, who marvels at the "depth of the riches of the wisdom of God." Earth-born, it returns to the dust whence it came. True it is that all men know they must die; but in this statement of fact, we find no hint of the glorious truth that all human life springs out of eternity, spans time for a flaming moment, and then sweeps forth to an infinite destiny beyond the grave. It is true that most men are soon forgotten by their fellows, but it is also true that God does not forget, and in that "world beyond," men too shall know even as they are known.

Good Men and Good Deeds Immortal

Good men and good deeds are immortal in time as well as in eternity. "The evil that men do lives after them; the good is oft interred with their bones" is not true. Just as the words of Jesus, spoken into the impalpable air, shall never pass away, so all that is good and true in human achievement finds care and shelter in this world under the brooding presence of God.

Fifty years ago this nation was ablaze with war. Men who were brothers in blood and language and faith faced each other in mortal combat. Both sides believed that they were right, and, strong in this belief, they submitted their cause to the "dread arbitrament of war." The war is over. The issue has been decided for all time. The great armies, victor and vanquished alike, have been swallowed up in the vast and pulsing floods of peace. But the heroes in blue and gray are not forgotten. On Memorial Day, that beautiful festival dedicated to brotherly love, there will assemble in town and hamlet, the wide land over, little groups of old men wearing the uniforms of North and South. Around them will throng their children and children's children, silent, reverent, thrilled with the consciousness that they are beholding one of the world's tragedies. To the sound of drum and bugle these little groups of veterans will make their way to the graveside of their fallen comrades. There, surrounded by the solemn emblems of man's mortality, under the kindly skies of spring, they will lay, with reverent and tender hands, flowers upon the graves of their unforgotten dead. Then in prayer and speech and song they will recall the heroic days so swiftly passing into memory. Battles will be described anew. Tears will fall as the sacred dead march once again to meet the foe. And into these dear old faces, wan and seamed with the storms of long years in war and peace, there will creep the splendor of a divine experience. Love is always great, but never greater than when it has claimed the offering of a life upon its heaven-kindled altars.

The Love of Country

This Memorial Day with its infinite pathos, its tender ministries, stands unique among the holy days of the nation. What cosmic truths, what primal principles are incarnate in these little groups of marching veterans! Simple-hearted and circumscribed as all must be, these men arrayed in armies have settled by the grim ordeal of battle the most momentous questions of human history. They ended slavery forever. They unveiled the sure foundations of a free democracy, with roar of cannon they closed an era and ushered in a new age. Moved simply by love of country they found themselves the agents of an Almighty God in the unfolding of his wise and good purpose for the race. Around their campfires, burning lower every year, there hover the spirits of emancipated millions. Human slavery makes slaves of master and servant alike. It is wrong, and Truth can never rest upon a foundation of falsehood. The issue was one Nation and Liberty. The Nation was saved and Liberty enshrined forever in one mighty Union. There is no longer any North or South. The Blue and Gray march side by side in love, as brothers ought.

> No more shall the war-cry sever,
> Or the winding rivers be red;
> They banish our anger forever
> When they laurel the graves of our dead!
> Under the sod and the dew,
> Waiting the judgment day;
> Love and tears for the Blue,
> Tears and love for the Gray.

These grizzled veterans in Gray and Blue by the graves of their fallen comrades are something greater than they seem if we but have eyes to see and ears to hear. They speak to us of the Past and Present and Future. Their message is of grave import to all. They proclaim that no people can escape from nor break with its Past. The root that bloomed blood-red upon the battlefields of the Civil War was planted by martyr hands amidst the shadows of the early Christian ages. And that blossom is ripening its fruit to-day in the widening energies of industrial liberty. The history of civilization is simply the story of progressive emancipation from bondage of the soul. Men move forward from fear to faith. The bondage of selfishness and slavery is ever breaking down before the onrolling stream of love and liberty.

When this Republic was born, even wise men believed that the nation had escaped from the history that produced it. A new Constitution with new machineries of government, a new land waiting the conquest of a young race, all seemed to lend support to such a conclusion. But although the hateful tyranny of the English king was broken, those great ideas, those standards of life and morals, the daily language and religion of the people, which had nourished the fathers over seas, nourished now the sons. It was simply a new bottle for old wine.

The Past and the Present

When our brave soldiers from North and South laid down their arms and took up the tools of trade and commerce, the real battles were yet to fight. Liberty and union had become the foundation principles of our nation, but it yet remained to apply them in all their fulness to our life. The black man was no longer a slave, but he was not free, nor could either South or North escape from him. And beyond these concrete and local considerations there remained the fact that a great truth carries with it a great burden. The Civil War stands between two eras. It closed the long struggle for political freedom. It established the principle upon which the state was to rest forever. But it ushered in the age of industrialism, which soon developed new problems and demanded a new application of the idea of Liberty. The pain and woe and waste of war rolled like an engulfing flood over the whole nation. But our present generation faces difficulties as dangerous and duties as serious as any in all history. We have no slaves and no question as to the political union of the States, but we have industrial injustice and tyranny; unrest and anarchy widespread and ominous. We have a racial problem more acute than that of the black man; we have the incubus of the city, the fever of class consciousness, the hateful contrasts of wealth and poverty; and with it all the certainty that there is no turning back. When the first slave landed on our shores the Civil War was born. In his manacled hands he held the torch which was to kindle the fires of fratricidal strife. When we accepted from the hands of the god of war the fixed principle of union and liberty, we accepted with it the impossibility of peace until we have applied the principle to the totality of our social relations. The Past is with us to-day, laying upon our lives the heavy burden of moral obligation. As we stand in reverence by the tombs of our mighty dead let us not forget that great blessings have a great price. And let the veterans pray that their children may be brave and loyal to live and die for the nation they have given us at the cost of noble blood.

The Present is a time of storm and stress, but the message of the old soldier is one of hope. Where in all recorded history is there a chapter of heroism more sublime than that of the Southern soldier going home after the war? Going home! Let me rather say going to a scene of ruin and desolation which added a thousandfold to the bitterness of battle. His fields laid waste, his house in ruins, his cities shrunken under the siege of victorious foemen, his machinery of production gone forever and as yet nothing to take its place—the hero of peace became greater than the hero of war. He did again what he had been doing for four years of struggle: summoned the unconquerable powers of his manhood to the task and bowed his willing back to the burden. And God has blessed him and his children and children's children. Again the fertile fields are blooming. The sun shines upon countless happy and prosperous homes, and a new South, greater, more daring, more beautiful, has leaped from the ashes of the past. In the North, too, the old soldier has become first in peace as he was first in war. To write his history since Appomattox is to write the story of our vast industrial and social progress.

The Watchwords of To-day

These were men indeed! And what answer can their children give them? In war and peace they have conquered. Heroism, honor, self-sacrifice, service, these are the words blazoned upon their battle flags, alas, held now in trembling hands. Shall these not become the watchwords of the Present? Are not the men of to-day even as their fathers? Shall we turn aside from the battle and the burden? Shall we lose the heritage? I believe in American manhood and womanhood. I believe that our age will pay the price of its greatness and live and die in the faith. The coward and the traitor will bring no flowers to mark the grave of heroes, but the multitudes of our brave and strong and true, standing there between the living and the dead, will consecrate their lives afresh to God and country and their fellow men, thankful for the privilege of thus proving their royal descent.

The future belongs to the young. There is no doubt that the future will find life more difficult than it ever has been. The physical strength of men cannot keep pace with the mountainous complexity and burden of modern society. We have created a monster and are in danger of being broken in his iron hands. But we have our principle and we must apply it—Liberty and Union. The worker must be free and so must his employer. Class union is no union at all. We belong to all or to none. Class consciousness and class hatred are social treason.

The Blue and Gray March Together

It has been possible for states and races to live in peace after long and bitter struggle. The French and English fought for supremacy on this continent for generations. Upon the Heights of Abraham, under the ramparts of Louisburg, upon the broad plains of the West, along the shores of Champlain the struggle persisted. But to-day French and English in Canada vie with each other in loyalty to their common country, and the Celtic passion finds friendship with Saxon strength in building together the foundations of a great young nation. In a Southern city built mainly by Northern men, I have seen old soldiers in gray and blue marching side by side in honor of the birthday of the Father of their common country. And as we turn to our inevitable Future we must not fear. Liberty is yet to be enthroned in all the realms of our social life. But Liberty can never be divorced from Union. The next struggle lies in the mystic regions of the spirit. Men are never alike until they are alike in soul, and soul likeness is born of the consciousness of a common origin. The sons of God are the best brothers of men. We may differ in opinion and our interests will clash, but if the memory of this present generation is not to be forgotten we must fight the war through with courage to the end, and then, like the brave soldiers of fifty years ago, forgetting the wounds and bitterness, join hands and hearts in united service of our common country. In the great work of reconciliation our Divine Redeemer laid down his life upon the cross. This is the mission of good men in all ages, and there is no other instrument but the Cross, as there can be no other motive but love.

FORGIVEN

I KNOW my sins are very great
Against God's just command.
Their vile enormity I hate,
Without excuse I stand
Justly condemned! What hope have I?
Oh, whither, whither, can I fly?

I know God's mercy, through his Son,
Invites my wandering feet.
This gives me hope: although undone
I seek that safe retreat.
I hear his call, I haste, I fly!
God gave his Son for such as I.

I know my Saviour died for me,
He died that I might live.
From sin my Saviour sets me free,
My sins he doth forgive.
Forgiven! Oh, that word imparts
A joy supreme to trusting hearts.

I know that my Redeemer rose!
Forth from the grave he came.
He triumphed over all his foes,
I'll conquer in his name.
I'll trust in him to end all strife,
He gives to me eternal life.

I know my Lord at God's right hand
Supreme in glory reigns.
In his loved presence I shall stand
Redeemed from all my chains.
I'll sing with an unnumbered host
"Praise Father, Son and Holy Ghost."

Passaic, N. J. JOHN M. MORSE.

Ignorance of the Bible

ONE of the professors of a certain university in the Northwest, says the New York Tribune, gave a test to 139 students to determine the extent of their Bible knowledge. The test consisted of eight questions, by no means hard ones. Twelve passed with 75 per cent., 91 had less than 50 per cent., 71 had 40 per cent., 10 could not name a single book of the Old Testament. Among those who did name such books, the spelling was brilliantly fantastic. "Duderominy," "Goshua," Salms" and "Joob" are examples. Among the Old Testament books a number of the students mentioned "Paul," "Timothy," "Babylonians," "Gentiles," "Philistines" and "Xerxes" to the surprise of the professor. Others gave as books in the New Testament "Samuel," "Ruth," "Esther," "Simon," "Jacob," "Philipi," "Thomas," "Lazarus" and "Samson Agonistes." The question "Who was the Apostle to the Gentiles?" brought out a great variety of answers, including John the Baptist, Methuselah, Judas, Moses, Abraham and Jacob, and the identity of the "beloved disciple" was almost as great a mystery. Apollos (Paul's convert and co-worker) was variously explained to be a heathen deity, a mountain, a town, a king, a giant, a judge, a church, the "Promised Land," a desert, etc. Apropos of this remarkable showing, the professor writes: "I think it will be generally granted that Biblical history is as worthy of study as any other ancient history, and that Biblical literature is as worthy as any other literature. Why should not the school prepare a syllabus or outline of Bible study, the following out of which would involve serious study well worthy of academic recognition?"

In Loco Parentis

(See Cover)

THE canvas which provides this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with its cover is one of the vast number of genre pictures by artists, many of whom have been and are eminently successful but have never achieved world-wide fame. The picture is, as its group name denotes, just a little scene from the everyday life of the humbler classes of the world's society; this time one might imagine the inspiration drawn from the living-room of a typical wide-hearthed, frugal Scottish cottage. It is a homely picture in the all too rapidly disappearing meaning of that word, home-like. Its appeal is not that of brilliant color, or even of striking subject, but simply the never-failing charm of sleeping babyhood and the interest aroused by the faithful terrier, who sits wide-eyed and grave "in loco parentis," in the place of the parent.

His Soul Is Marching On

By Eugene Thwing

IN a few days a grateful people will be celebrating the day that is consecrated to the soldiers. Music and flags and sweet garlands of flowers will attest the loving memory in which these heroes are ever held. They gave all they had to give—their lives—in devotion to their country, and counted the sacrifice all too small to measure the depth and breadth of their love. "I only regret that I have but one life to give for my country" were the last words of Nathan Hale.

Feeling some glow of the same patriotism within us; conscious of a live spark of the same eager love of country ready to leap into flame in response to memory of the past or call of the present; recognizing the sacred heritage won for us by the blood of heroes who died, we dedicate a day to do them honor and beautify their memory with flowers. May the warmth of our tributes never abate, but rather increase with the ever growing greatness of our land.

Yet the manner in which we celebrate Decoration Day carries with it a mistake. The eloquence of our orators and the songs of our poets constantly perpetuate a false idea. Our patriotic societies, year after year, are missing a wonderful opportunity. A Christian nation is failing, in this particular at least, to put into practice the one great truth of the Christian belief. We hear always of "Our sleeping comrades," "Where sleep the brave," "Sleep, heroes, sleep," and "Scatter the fragrant flowers o'er the silent sleeper's head."

Why must we forever "repair to the graves" to remind ourselves and our children of the patriots who fought bravely for love of country? They are not there. Not even their memory is buried in the ground. Certainly the spirit of their noble patriotism is not buried there. "Why seek the living among the dead?" Nothing but a useless and discarded body, like an old suit of clothes, "lies a-moldering in the ground" in that soldier's grave. The soldier himself is not there. Dauntless bravery was not in that body. More than likely it shivered with fear. The pure fire of patriotism did not burn in that body. It may be the flesh was very weak and had to be forced to obey the real patriot. All the splendid bravery and patriotism were in the soldier's soul, and "his soul goes marching on." The grave is the poorest place in all the world to do it honor and keep its influence alive.

THINK of the wealth of beautiful flowers from field and hothouse that will be laid on the graves in cemeteries where they will be seen by few and enjoyed by none. They are offered, and will continue to be offered, as a nation's loving tribute, but the soldiers are not there to receive them, and the larger lesson of patriotism which the flowers might carry is lost.

Suppose the whole plan were changed, or broadened, and the flowers were taken, as a soldier's message, direct to the living, growing, eager young citizens of the republic. How Decoration Day would instantly be vitalized and become one of the most glorious days of the year! How our hero soldiers who fought and fell would cease to be kept down under the cold earth as "our sleeping comrades," but would live again, and their souls would indeed "go marching on" through the land, making new patriots everywhere!

Jacob A. Riis has told of the eagerness of the city waifs for flowers. He tried repeatedly to take flowers from his Long Island home to the poor people in Mulberry Street, New York City. "But they never got there," he says. "Before I had got half a block from the ferry, I was held up by a shrieky mob of children who cried for the posies and would not let me go another step until I had given them one. And when they got it they ran, shielding the flower with the most jealous care, to some place where they could hide and gloat over their treasure. They came dragging big, fat babies and little weazened ones that they might get a share, and the babies' eyes grew round and big at the sight of the golden glory from the fields, the like of which had never come their way. And so my flowers went. Who could have said them no?"

Suppose those beautiful flowers—that golden glory from the fields—were to go to these children of the streets in the name and memory of the soldiers who died on the glory field to make this land a free land for all; suppose that on Decoration Day, instead of laying the flowers on graves where no one is, the old veterans in their uniforms, and with their music, should carry armfuls of flowers, in memory of their departed comrades, to distribute among the boys and girls of the city streets to whom a real flower is like a rare jewel; suppose the flowers were taken, especially, with their soldier's message of patriotism, among the foreigners who become voters in our land without knowing anything of its history or its noble ideals—then indeed would the brave souls of our heroes go marching on.

SUPPOSE on Decoration Day all the boys and girls of our public schools are assembled for patriotic music and entertainment, and at the close each boy and each girl is given a small potted plant, just bursting into bloom. The names of the soldiers who went from their town, or city, or village have been gathered from the records, and one soldier's name is written on a card attached to each plant. The message is brought straight home in a definite, personal way when the flowers are distributed. For example:

"That soldier, my boy, whose name is on your flower, loved his country so well that he gave up everything for it, and suffered hunger, and pain, and long, weary marches, and cold, and loss of loved ones—all for this country of his and yours. He fought, and shed his blood, and died for his beloved country. We are enjoying what he made possible for us. Now he sends you that flower as a living memory, so that you may think of what he did and why he did it. Love his memory and care for your flower for his sake. As you watch it grow, let his brave, soldierly spirit grow in you. As you smell its sweet fragrance, let the fragrance of his love of country fill your soul. You may have to fight some day. Perhaps not as he fought on the bloody field of battle, but against other wrongs that hurt our beloved country. Be a patriot, as he was. Love your country, as he did. We are remembering him to-day, and his message comes to you, an old soldier to a young soldier, in that flower."

Decoration Day may mean so much, so very much, in the upbuilding of intelligent patriotism in this country if we will only use it aright.

Poems Everyone Should Know

THE SANDS OF DEE

O MARY, go and call the cattle home,
And call the cattle home,
And call the cattle home
Across the sands of Dee."
The western wind was wild and dank wi' foam,
And all alone went she.

The western tide crept up along the sand,
And o'er and o'er the sand,
And round and round the sand,
As far as eye could see.
The rolling mist came down and hid the land,
And never home came she.

"Oh, is it weed, or fish, or floating hair—
A tress o' golden hair,
A drowned maiden's hair
Above the nets at sea?
Was never salmon yet that shone so fair
Among the stakes on Dee."

They rowed her in across the rolling foam,
The cruel crawling foam,
The cruel hungry foam,
To her grave beside the sea;
But still the boatmen hear her call the cattle home
Across the sands of Dee!

CHARLES KINGSLEY.

A short biographical note of Charles Kingsley appeared in our issue of April 24, appended to his poem, The Three Fishers.

Origin of Memorial Day

DAYS set apart upon which the living pay tribute to the heroic dead are as old as history. The ancient Druids not only covered soldiers' graves with sweet-scented flowers and evergreens, but planted gardens and groves in their memory. Early Christians, revolting at any heathen custom whatsoever, it mattered not how beautiful it was, invented other memorial services, and to differentiate heathen sentiment from their own, they declared, "We will not sprinkle their graves with flowers, but upon their spirits the odor of Christ. Let others scatter baskets of bloom if they like. Christ is our Lily and with his love will we consecrate his servants."

Virgil, describing the grief of Anchises for Marcellus, says in the immortal Æneid:

Full canisters of fragrant lilies bring,
Mixed with purple roses of the spring:
Let me with funeral flowers his body strew:
This gift, which parents to their children owe—
This unavailing gift at least I may bestow.

Two years after the close of the Civil War, the women of Columbus, Miss., tenderly spread the graves of the Boys in Blue and Gray alike with flowers. As the news of this touching tribute of love and loyalty spread to the North, it awoke general approval, and before long it was suggested to General John A. Logan, the National Commander of the Grand Army of the Republic, that the organization inaugurate a common Memorial Day sacred to the memory of all soldiers. Now the whole country feels that the day is one set apart for the exaltation of patriotism and of those soldierly attributes that typify the highest race of men—courage, self-sacrifice and service.

Ruins of the Temple of Æsculapius

The Garden, Chapel and Museum of St. Louis at Carthage

An Heroic Pagan Priestess

BY WALTER J. YATES, Ph.D.

Traveling Companion and Secretary of Bishop Hartzell on His African Tour

A Punic Priestess of 500 B.C.

DID you ask, "What one thing was most impressive on the site of ancient Carthage?" There were many impressive and thrilling things there, perhaps more than I have ever seen elsewhere in an equal length of time, but without hesitation I reckon that the one object beyond all others which produced the most profound and lasting impression on mind and feelings was the face of the "Punic Priestess."

Our missionary friend from Tunis, who guided us, had said:

"I will let you look into the face of a priestess of Carthage who lived five hundred years before Christ."

But the remark might mean so many things that it passed almost unheeded. We did ask if he meant a mummy, having in mind those so common in Egypt and the various museums of the world. But he said, "No." So the subject dropped. We were in the museum back of the Chapel of St. Louis, on the site of the ancient citadel of the city. We had visited all the buildings which have yet been discovered and excavated. As we came to a corner of the main room he pointed,

"There she is. What do you think of her?"

A stone sarcophagus stood on the floor in front of us. A close look showed signs of some resinous preservative on the sides and bottom. Near the head was a dark rounded object with some fibrous matter near it. Lower down were some straight articles like pieces of wood, or were they bones? They were very old and decayed and lay upon a thin coating of dark brown dust which covered the bottom of the sarcophagus. That was not what he meant, however.

Fastened to the wall of the room above the burial casket was its marble cover sculptured in high relief with the figure of a woman. In any collection it would instantly attract attention as entirely out of the ordinary. It was different from anything we had ever seen, or heard described.

It was the face that fascinated and held you. It was not Roman, nor was it Grecian. The headdress, with its ends falling by the sides of the neck and in front of the shoulders, gave a faint suggestion of Egyptian art, but only for a moment, for it clearly was not an Egyptian face nor the work of an Egyptian artist. Face, figure, pose, draperies, the dove in the right hand, all marked it as belonging in a new class. It was Punic, pure and simple, and nothing else. Traces of gilding and colors, red, blue, and yellow, could be detected on the face, neck and head-draperies. The arrangement of the drapery over the breast was unusual. The skirt of the robe was two reversed wings of the ibis, crossed, and with tips turned outward at the bottom, revealing the sandaled feet. It was an exceedingly bold conception, and effectively managed.

But it was the face to which you returned repeatedly. It must have been a portrait. You could feel no doubt of that. And what a portrait! What an artist! What a woman!

Here was Carthaginian womanhood of the highest type when Carthage was the metropolis of the world. It was sensuous but not sensual, as we might have been led to expect. It did not lack mentality, though it was not of the purely intellectual cast. It was not mystically spiritual, though high-spirited and with power of deep devotion. It was not a cruel face, though the religious rites of the time would seem inevitably to have made it such. It was well-rounded, deep-chested, full-breasted physical womanhood, as fine as the world has produced.

Who was she? No one knows with certainty, only that she was a high priestess of the Punic religion in Carthage some twenty-five centuries ago. Her stone casket was buried one hundred and forty feet below the surface of the ground, where it remained undisturbed by all the changes which went on above it during the passing ages, until it was recently discovered and removed to this room.

Two centuries before Christ the Roman people had become powerful on the northern and eastern coasts of the Mediterranean Sea as the Carthaginians had on the southern shores. Their interests clashed and they were unable to agree on any plan for permanent peace. Cato, who had been ambassador to Carthage, declared again and again in the Roman Senate: "Carthage must be destroyed."

So persistently and convincingly did Cato talk that at last Rome believed her only safety lay in the course he advised and sent Scipio to do the deed. It took time, skill and hard fighting, but he did it and did it so effectually that the whole Punic civilization was entirely swept from the earth. All its literature was destroyed except one treatise on agriculture and a book by Hanno the Carthaginian describing voyages. Its buildings were demolished, its laws, which had for eight hundred years governed all North Africa and brought peace and great material prosperity, were done away. Its army and people who were not killed were thoroughly conquered and the land was made a Roman province. So fertile was the soil that it soon became "the granary of Rome."

The very completeness of Scipio's destruction of Carthage has been the means of preserving many of the things of most value to us in our study of the life and religions of the ancient times. Carthage had three great cemeteries in close proximity to her great temples. Here her dead were buried in niches on both sides of galleries tunneled into the hills, much as the catacombs of Rome were made in after times. It is the religion of this people in which most interest centers. It was entirely different from the religions of Greece and Rome. It was Asiatic in origin and continued to the last essentially Oriental in character. It was the Baal worship of Tyre which Jezebel, the queen of Ahab, undertook to fasten on Israel in the days of Elijah. In essence it was the worship of the reproductive powers of nature under the symbols of the sun and moon as the male and female principles of life. It was both licentious and cruel, as all nature worship must be. It sacrificed its first-born children, especially if males, as the most valuable offering to its gods. When the Sicilians defeated its fleet in battle, two hundred of the choicest of the children of Carthage were sacrificed to Baal under the name of Moloch. They were thrown into the outstretched arms of the great image of brass, to fall into the flames below and be burned alive. The mothers were obliged to stand by and see it all, and shed no tears. There were priestesses as well as priests. What style of women could do such things? It is useless to search the writings of the Romans for an unbiased opinion of this people, for the Romans were their bitterest enemies. But the great cemeteries buried deep under the ruins of the city have kept the secret until a people have come who care and know how to read the signs. These gently-rounded hills, with grassy slopes and cultivated fields, show no remains of walls above ground, no masses of ruins. Yet the ruins served to build Tunis, Constantine, Algiers, Genoa, Pisa and Venice, for all in turn quarried them for building materials; but none disturbed the antique tombs in the depths of the hills below until the French established the "Protectorate of Tunisia" in 1880. Then monks under the leadership of Cardinal Lavigerie came, and in digging for foundations of the cathedral, they came on one of the ancient cemeteries and found the bodies and articles buried with them ages long past. These were carefully preserved and collected in their museum. It was by them that this "Punic priestess" was discovered.

Look into that face again, and I will tell you how one like her offered the last and supreme sacrifice to Moloch on this very spot. Scipio had defeated the Carthaginian army at every point. Hasdrubal, finding further resistance useless, had surrendered. Only the citadel still held out. It stood on this hill of the Byrsa and its ruins are underneath the Chapel of St. Louis and this museum. It contained the temple of Æsculapius, the principal shrine of the Punic religion. Standing on the slope of the hill below with the Roman general, Hasdrubal called upon his wife to surrender the citadel and save further loss of life. From the battlements she with her three children had watched the progress of the battle. Now, the whole populace and both armies watched her. She stood the highest woman of her line, the last priestess at the shrine of the ancient faith. Carthage was destroyed. Should she consent to the shame of walking captive with her children through the streets of Rome to save her life and theirs? She had commanded that the temple be set on fire. It was now a glowing furnace behind her. She heard the call and command of her husband. All was silent, save the crackling of the flames, listening for her answer. With face glowing and eyes aflame, but not from the heat of the burning temple, she called his name, but not in tones he had ever heard before. She called him coward and heaped upon him all the bitterness and wrath of a wounded lioness brought to bay and fighting for life. Surrender to Rome? Never! Turning, she called on Scipio and hurled at him fiercest hatred and defiance. Then seizing her eldest son in one long, passionate embrace, she swung him high and hurled him far into the depths of the burning temple, a sacrifice to her gods. A thrill of horror ran through the ranks of the army. But look! The second and the third by her own hands are thrown into the flames. With one last gesture of high triumph and defiance, she leaps after them.

I ask you, as Purdon our friend asked me when he pointed me to this portrait of the "Punic priestess," "Well, what do you think of her?" You do not answer. I did not expect you would. I know what you think. It was grandly heroic; but it was heathen, hopeless heroism. Of what might not such womanhood be capable if Christianized?

This is the story of the "Punic Priestess."

FLOOD SUFFERERS IN DIRE NEED

NEARLY 200,000 PEOPLE DRIVEN FROM THEIR HOMES ALONG THE MISSISSIPPI. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD SENDS ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS AND STARTS A FUND

Landing Refugees and Rescued Live Stock at Vicksburg

Placing a Revetment to Strengthen the Levee Above New Orleans

ONLY last night another crevasse occurred, completing the circle of disaster on the west side of the Mississippi." There is deep pathos in this statement of Louisiana's governor, for it carries with it the picture of a stretch of America's most fertile and thickly settled South devastated by the floods, and nearly two hundred thousand people driven, homeless and many of them penniless, to places of safety where only the generosity of their countrymen and their government can avert the most appalling suffering. For three hundred and sixty miles the Mississippi has overflowed its banks, and a strip of country ranging from ten to one hundred and thirty miles in width lies under from four to twenty-seven feet of water. One of the late reports stated that by the tearing away of 1,400 feet of the south end of the Torras crevasse, a wall of water from eight to ten feet deep and nearly a half mile in width is being poured down upon the already overflowed areas of three parishes.

The rescue work among the marooned in the overflowed sections has been pushed as rapidly as possible and it is now believed that practically all have been brought to places of safety. The numbers in the concentration camps have been immensely swelled by those who were brought in from the territory between Natchez and New Orleans. It has been a cause of remark and great surprise that such large families have been found among the white refugees from the more isolated districts. One woman who passed through New Roads was accompanied by her family of sixteen children. Mothers with eight, nine and ten have been numerous, it is said, among the refugees from some of the northern parishes.

The work of rescue and of carrying rations and supplies to the concentration camps has now devolved entirely upon boats and improvised water craft. The flood relief train which has been bringing people from outlying districts was taken off on account of the flooding of its elevated tracks to such an extent that the engine fires could not be kept burning.

A few days of sunshine brought hope and good cheer to the desperate workers on the levees, but rain which followed and which with a forty-mile gale lashed the entire lower end of the river brought consternation in a great many places. At Baton Rouge and New Orleans the crest of the flood was so close to the tops of the levees that the wind actually blew the waves across the rampart and for a few hours the city streets were flooded to the depth of a few inches. No serious damage was done, however, and the work of relief is being actively carried on from those centers. The break to which Governor Sanders refers in his telegram added a great many more to the numbers of refugees who must be cared for. A New Orleans despatch stated on the following morning that approximately 60,000 persons were affected and that probably more than half of this number will be without homes until the flood waters find their way into the Gulf of Mexico in late June or early July. It is impossible in our short space to give the details of the despatches from all the districts, but here is one, a typical one, in the terse, blunt sentences of a newspaper reporter who is gathering his news at first hand:

"Another break 300 feet wide on Bayou des Glaizes occurred to-day, which puts the whole town of Moreauville under water. Practically the entire levee from Moreauville to Long Bridge has gone under. A few strips remain, but the water is rushing over them, and it is only a question of hours when a solid sheet of water five or six miles in width will be pouring into the fertile Bayou Jack and Bayou Choupique country. The country around Vidalia is rapidly filling up with water and that section is contributing vast numbers to the already crowded refugee camps. Word reached New Roads this morning that those marooned at Batchelor are looting the houses and stores to secure food."

Although the citizens of Louisiana are making desperate efforts to save their capital and their most important commercial city, the situation throughout the agricultural sections is admitted to be desperate. In the concentration camps thousands who escaped from their homes very scantily clad are without sufficient clothing. The government rations include no allowance for medical attention, and although the State itself is doing its utmost to relieve the distress, outside aid is an absolute necessity. The need of medical aid is sure to become more and more pressing as the flood abates under the hot early summer sun and the new menace which has come to light is more in evidence. This new danger is that of disease from the carcases of drowned live stock which have floated into the back waters of the flood and which, as yet, it is impossible to bury or burn.

In anticipation of the gifts of its subscribers and in view of the urgent need THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has already forwarded $1,000 to Governor Sanders, whose telegram of thanks appears on another page of this issue.

Louisiana's Great Need

Baton Rouge, La., May 15, 1912.
CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York:

In accordance with your telegram I have authorized draft by J. E. Edmonds, Secretary Relief Committee, in favor of L. J. Ricaus, Treasurer Relief Committee, through Louisiana National Bank.

The people of Louisiana are deeply appreciative of your prompt and generous aid to us in our time of distress. Only last night, another crevasse occurred, completing the circle of disaster on the west side of the Mississippi.

Louisiana is deeply touched by the thoughtfulness for her and her needs on the part of The Christian Herald and its subscribers.

J. Y. SANDERS,
Governor of Louisiana.

This acknowledgment of the first remittance of $1,000 sent by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in anticipation of contributions, will serve to remind our readers of the urgent need of our Southern brothers and sisters along the flooded Mississippi Valley. Don't wait one day longer, but send your offering to-day to the Flood Fund, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York. Remember, every dollar may save a life. We wish all of our readers to share in this relief work at home. "He gives twice who gives quickly."

"Decoration Day"

IT IS hard to break old habits. All the American people, except the newest youngsters, have said "Decoration Day" for so long that it is impossible for them to say "Memorial Day" without stopping first, and translating the old term into the new. Perhaps "Memorial Day" is a more beautiful name, and a name whose appropriateness to the occasion is more easily and quickly seen. But "Decoration Day" was a good term, too. How memories of sweet old times come flocking to the heart when we say it, and think of it! What visions rise of sweet flowers and sweet faces mingled with glimpses of blue coats and black slouch hats with brave gold braid; what strains float through the years from the horns and drums of the old band, and from the tongues of the village choir gathered with the little organ upon the speaker's stand; what echoes from earnest speech under the blue sky, above the swelling graves where lie the wearied, broken bodies of the men who dared death to save our land, graves that seem lonely for most of the year, but on this day burst into bloom and become drenched with summer fragrances!

DECORATION DAY! How wasted fingers of sad soldier widows, how fairy fingers of soldier's great-grandchildren lay blossoms on the turf and think of the brave men buried there! How the tears steal out upon the faces of the lonely wives, thinking of the dreadful war days, and of that darkest hour of all when word came that the soldier husband's heart had been stilled by the bullet's rush! How baby faces smile up at grandmother's tears, seeing only the flowers, and remembering only that grandfather was the bravest man in the world! How the living comrades march, with steps less steady every year, to honor the comrades dead; how they stand amid the fragrance and the music and the words of homage, remembering the horrors of trench and camp and siege and charge! How the bands will play again, while old men and old women remember the time when the words were full of heartbreak:

> Many are the hearts that are weary to-night,
> Waiting for the war to cease;
> Many are the hearts looking for the right
> To see the dawn of peace.

DECORATION DAY! Like so many other great days of the year it ought to be remembered not only once a year, but on many another day. Is there anything else we may decorate except their graves? Let us see. Paul has a remarkable phrase in his letter to Titus that goes like this: "that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things." What could possibly be more beautiful, more perfectly beautiful, than "the doctrine of God our Saviour"? Yet Paul suggests that certain Christians, meaning of course all Christians, adorn that doctrine, that is, make it still more beautiful. This sounds impossible, but it can be done. The doctrine of our Saviour is meant for men; it is a plan for men. When it has swept into the soul of a man, filling him with glory, then that man adorns the doctrine. And his daily task is to keep on making more and more beautiful, by his life and words, the doctrine which found and saved him. Is there not a hint here of a way in which we may all decorate the memory of the brave men who went forward toward duty, even when duty meant death? We adorn their graves on Memorial Day; may we not adorn their memories every day by trying to live worthily of them? Our tender reverence for them is a beautiful thing; but we can make it more beautiful by not forgetting during the other days, and by trying, because of our reverence for them, to bear our small burdens bravely as they bore their great ones, by meeting life gladly and victoriously every day, as they met death.

WHEN the last wreath has been laid down, the last song sung, the last rank of uniformed men dismissed, then begins the real test which will show whether we are to be worthy or unworthy of the great heritage these heroes left us.

> The tumult and the shouting dies;
> The captains and the kings depart;
> Still stands thine ancient sacrifice,
> An humble and a contrite heart.
> Lord God of hosts, be with us yet,
> Lest we forget, lest we forget.

President Taft's View of the Case

PRESIDENT TAFT has issued a statement to the press, in which he makes the charge that his political enemies have conspired to misrepresent his attitude toward the Roman Catholic Church and to accuse him of undue favoritism. He is pained that his acts should have received the interpretation that has been put upon them by various denominational bodies, notably the Methodist General Conference at Minneapolis, the Protestant Episcopal Diocese at Washington, the Washington Ministerial Conference, the Lutheran Synods, the Home Missions Council of New York and similar organizations, which have criticized his course in suspending the order of Commissioner Valentine of the Indian Bureau for the discontinuance of Catholic garb, emblems and regalia in the Indian schools.

Mr. Taft's explanation of his action in this particular case is that he desired to give the Catholic teachers "a full hearing," and to let the question be ruled upon by the Secretary of the Interior. The constitutionality of Commissioner Valentine's act was never questioned. In rescinding the commissioner's order in the face of protests from the various Protestant denominations, the President took what seemed to logical minds to be the most direct method of inviting the public criticism of which he now so strongly complains, yet he now declares: "I have unduly favored no church, but have treated all with absolute impartiality."

There are other matters touched upon in the President's statement, which appears in full in another column. He declares that in the Philippines, in the War Department, and as Chief Executive, he has always tried "to encourage every church as far as possible when this did not involve invidious distinctions, and did not depart from the rule which separates our State from official relations to all churches." He recalls his conference with Pope Leo XIII. in 1902, which resulted in the settlement of the Friar Lands dispute, and he also refers to his recent letter to introduce Major Butt to the present Pope, which, he explains, was a simple letter of introduction and no more. A Marconigram from Rome, dated March 21, which was printed in the New York Sun of March 22, stated that Major Butt presented the President's letter to the Pope, in which Mr. Taft thanked "the Pontiff for the creation of three new American cardinals. The President wrote that this action was acceptable to Americans, irrespective of their faith, as Catholicism contributes to the welfare of the country." Mr. Taft's explanation, however, specifically denies this, and he is entitled to be heard, with his own version of these matters.

Unquestionably, the pronounced attitude of the Roman Catholic Church leaders and press in the United States has been largely to blame for Mr. Taft's uncomfortable dilemma. But if there had been no coquetting with Rome, would these publications have openly boasted of the church's growing political influence; of its powerful friends in the "high places" of the nation; of the "royal precedence" due to its cardinals at official functions, and of the church's ultimate supremacy in this country? If a way had not been opened, would these journals have declared so confidently that Catholics must wield their votes to secure the church's ascendency in the nation, and that legislation, education, public opinion and the press must be governed to that end? It was foolish vaunting, calculated to excite a storm if they were not sure enough of their ground to make the venture.

Long before a single Protestant body took action, this dangerous boasting was going on unchecked. As for the Protestant press, it has been singularly free from any discussion of the subject, although it is one that strikes at the root of all that Americans hold dear, and which justifies the fullest and freest criticism. Somebody has been playing with fire, or there would have been no conflagration. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD regards the whole issue as one which, unless some one—statesman or politician—had been more than indiscreet, need never have been raised in a land where church and state must forever be distinct and separate, and where all are guaranteed absolute freedom of religion.

Campaign Endearments

POPULAR interest is kept constantly keyed up to the point of intensity by the rapid-fire movements of the various candidates in the presidential canvass. State after State is invaded, and as quickly as one candidate blazes a trail, the others are close on his heels. This applies equally to both the leading political parties. The one "fly in the ointment," which detracts somewhat from the picturesqueness of the struggle, is the superabundance of personalities. These have played an unusually prominent part in the campaign, East and West. When the air is filled with such choice epithets as "falsifier," "demagogue," "flatterer," "egotist," "friend of the bosses," "honeyfugler," "puzzlewit," "neurotic" and similar terms of political endearment, dropped from the lips of men who might be expected rather to lend dignity and deportment to the public platform thoughtful Americans may be forgiven a blush for our latter-day statesmanship, which seems to have lost sight of the old-fashioned eloquence that could be witty without abuse, and could carry conviction by arguments free from the sting of personalities.

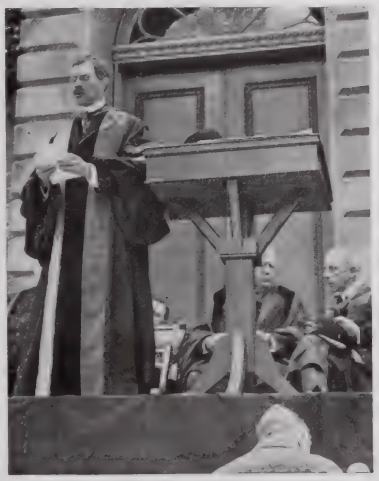
Princeton's President Inaugurated

DR. JOHN GRIER HIBBEN was inaugurated as president of Princeton University on May 11 before a large and distinguished audience with the most imposing ceremonies ever witnessed at Princeton. President Taft and Chief Justice White were present to receive the degree of LL.D. conferred by Princeton, and eighty-two heads of colleges and universities in the country were in the distinguished procession of the inaugural. Rev. Dr. Henry Van Dyke read the Scripture lesson and offered prayer. The oath of office was administered by Justice Mahlon Pitney of the Supreme Court of the United States. The subject of President Hibben's inaugural address was "The Essentials of a Liberal Education," and stood for an arbitrary curriculum rather than an elective course of study. This was the heart of his message: "We believe, moreover, that the best preparation for the freedom of the life of reason is that group of studies whose very nature tends to the training of the powers of the mind, developing in a man both capability and resource, and at the same time giving him a knowledge of himself and of the world in which he lives. To see, to think, to feel, and to remain dumb withal—is any bondage more intolerable?" There were four thousand persons seated and two thousand standing during the impressive ceremonies. Dr. Hibben is a graduate of Princeton, and for twenty-one years has been a member of the faculty there. He is the idol of the students and well known to the men who elected him. The song sung by the students around the half-buried cannon in the campus voiced the joyous spirit of the six thousand people there. It was this:

Tune every heart and every voice,
Bid every care withdraw.
Let all with one accord rejoice
In praise of old Nassau.

In praise of old Nassau, my boys,
Hurrah! Hurrah! Hurrah!
Her sons shall give while they shall live
Three cheers for old Nassau!



President Hibben Making His Inaugural Address

A Section of the Great Academic Crowd That Attended the Ceremonies at Princeton

What task more important or honorable than the one committed to the new president, and what wish could be more desirable than that Princeton should continue to pursue its high educational and moral standards and accomplish its glorious results? Paul refers to his college education and his gratitude to his distinguished instructor in these words:

I am verily a man which am a Jew, born in Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, yet brought up in this city at the feet of Gamaliel, and taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers. (Acts 22: 3.)

Gives Blood in Vain

THE Rev. Harold M. Ryder, pastor of the Methodist Church at Bay Shore, Long Island, was taken to the Seney Hospital in Brooklyn the other day, and the surgeon decided that an operation was necessary. It was performed, and a speedy recovery was expected. But the patient began to sink, and a transfusion of blood was decided upon as a last desperate resort. Be it said to the honor of the women that twenty-five nurses on the staff at the hospital offered to open their veins to save the life of the true man of God. A healthy girl of eighteen years was selected and she fainted under the ordeal, and it took a week or more to restore her vitality. But her heroism failed its purpose, for soon after the transfusion Mr. Ryder died. The Christly life of the minister was matched by the devoted service of the nurse, and all in imitation of Him who shed his blood that we might live. When there is this spiritual transfusion, death can never result; there must always be life.

In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace. (Eph. 1: 7.)

American Buys Irish Village

WHILE on a visit to Ireland, Michael J. O'Connor, a business man of New York City, bought at auction recently the estate of Drumheirney House and its two hundred and eighteen acres. The purchase puts the village of Leitrim, which has eight hundred inhabitants, and its environments in Mr. O'Connor's possession, and gratifies an ambition he had cherished since boyhood. Tile-making was the ancient industry of Leitrim, but fifty years ago the owners closed them. It is Mr. O'Connor's intention to open up the old works again and give employment to one-fourth of all the inhabitants of the village. Leitrim is the birthplace of Mr. O'Connor. He left it when twenty years of age. On doing so he determined that if he should prosper in business in America he would return and buy the estate of Drumheirney with its precious memories and practical opportunities. What a divine faculty it is to look into the future and see the things that are to be! What a wide and glorious universe it opens to mortals! The vision of the poor Irish emigrant looking at himself the owner of the old estate is in harmony with the prophecy:

And your young men shall see visions. (Acts 2: 17.)

Rich Platinum Deposits Discovered

PLATINUM deposits said to be worth more than $300,000 have been located in a section of the Grand Canyon in Arizona by several Philadelphians. They contemplate building an experimental plant for the reduction of the metal. The owner of the 800-acre tract where the deposits have been found took samples to Berlin, Paris, London and St. Petersburg to be analyzed. The chemists finally decided that although they believed the ore contained a quantity of platinum, besides iridium, rhodium, ruthenium, asmium and palladium, the metals could not be separated except at tremendous cost. The promoters have found an American chemist who claims to have made a recent discovery by which he can separate the metals of this platinum field at a cost that will be entirely reasonable. How prodigal God has been in his dealings with men in storing away the precious metals in the mountains as a treasure for his children! Moses refers to the value of native ores in the land promised:

A land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack anything in it; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass. (Deut. 8: 9.)

King George Decorates Prisoner

IT IS a rare thing to go to the criminal ranks to bestow honors. But King George of England did this when he awarded the Albert life-saving medal to an aboriginal Australian prisoner called "Neighbor." A trooper was leading "Neighbor" by a neck chain. While crossing a swollen stream the trooper's horse threw him into the water and kicked him in the face. The swift current was carrying the trooper to his death when the prisoner, scorning the opportunity to escape, risked his own life and barely saved it in his successful attempt to rescue his captor. For this heroism the king bestowed upon him a highly coveted decoration. There is no one so good that some streak of weakness cannot be found in him, and no one so bad that there is not some spark of goodness liable to be fanned into a flame by circumstances. The prisoner, in forgetting his own life, in throwing it away to save the life of another, found the life and the reward that belong to self-sacrificing service for others. What a sermon to Christian men and women this heroic criminal preached on labor for the salvation of others! What a repreaching of Christ's words:

Whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it. (Matt. 16: 25.)

Boy Pokes Third Rail

PETER YANARIO, aged fourteen, and Sylvester Garfello, aged fifteen, of New York City, were returning from a swim when Peter found a piece of copper wire, and in crossing the New York Central Railroad track concluded he would have some fun with the third rail. He began poking the wooden guards that cover three sides of the rail. There were no results. "That's funny," he exclaimed; "I guess I didn't hit the right spot." Then he thrust the wire underneath the rail. There was a flash of blue flame that ran along the wire and enveloped the boy, who shrieked in pain. The flame hissed and sputtered and set fire to his clothes. Another moment and his hair and eyebrows had been burned off. He tried to drop the wire, but couldn't. He tried to pull it from the rail, but it seemed soldered on. More than 11,000 volts of electricity were passed through the wire, which was at white heat. His clothes were nearly all burned off. His companion tried to pull him away, but fell to the ground with the shock. The brave little fellow wrapped the coat he had around his friend's head and pulled him loose. Fortunately it was a rubber coat. The burning boy ran a half mile and fainted. He was carried to a hospital where the surgeon said he had not one chance in a thousand for recovery. The boy knew there was something strange, even dangerous, about that third rail, and yet he was venturesome, like many boys, and took the risk, with the fearful consequences. What a type of the multitude of boys, and older persons as well, who trifle with moral dangers, not realizing the fearful consequences that are likely to follow! These tragedies of life suggest the question:

Can a man take fire in his bosom, and his clothes not be burned? (Prov. 6: 27.)

THE NEW PONY EXPRESS

A STORY OF BOYS, PONIES AND PAPERS

Pony Boy

TRY to think of the quintessence of joy. Doesn't a small boy riding a Shetland pony away from the freight-house to his father's barn come pretty near to being that?

It's not so long ago, either, but that you can remember with fair accuracy what it would be like to-day. You know where the freight-house stood, alongside the track, across the road from the station. You remember how the milk-cans used to stand there, and how gaily they rattled when the farmers rolled them, empty, into the waiting wagons. You remember the long, dusty road back toward the village, and father's house, halfway, with the old barn behind it. A boy, and a barn, and a horse of his own! There you have it.

The old hamlets are smart suburban villages now; the colts are ponies; but boyhood has not changed. And you see how it is. A three-year-old colt, or a five-year-old, was rather too delicate and uncertain a bit of mechanism to put into the hands of a boy. So you probably had to wait fairly long before you had a real flesh and blood horse of your own. But a Shetland pony—he's a real horse, and infinitely wiser than a colt, so he can be put into a boy's hands with safety to both—and there you are.

One of the interesting things about social and commercial progress is that forces which have long been in existence are newly discovered, or are discovered to have practical values formerly unknown. Electricity loafed around the clouds for centuries doing nothing for man except to frighten and occasionally maim or kill him, till Franklin sent up his kite and made practical and helpful connections. The great powers of democracy lay idle till Cromwell and Voltaire and Jefferson and others, among them our same friend Franklin, felt and saw the trustworthiness of the people's power and began to show them how to apply it in self-government.

Now here are these millions of boys and their boundless vigor; here is their love of possessing something of their own; here is their love of horseflesh; here is their love of a free road and a canter out toward the sky-line; here, browsing and waiting, are the Shetland ponies. Some dynamic there, if it can be attached to anything that would like to be pulled!

So the "pony contests" began. Here were the presses roaring out the editions of weeklies and monthlies; here were the editors collecting and creating material; here were the advertising men filling columns and pages with good advice about what to buy; here were people by the million insisting upon having something to read, and not knowing what to choose among so many offerings. Then arrived the "pony man." He said: "I've got the goods, and I'll show them. It's my paper they want, and if they would only look at it they'd know it. And the people to make them try it are the boys. It's out-door work, and it's half fun, and it won't interfere with their studies or their chores. And they'll work for me like all creation if I make a pony the prize. It will teach them something about business, and it will boom my paper. So here goes!"

And it did go. But after all that's another story. What you are interested in is not what it is doing for the paper and for the people who want the paper, but for the boys.

Now here's Fred Bush, the first boy to win a CHRISTIAN HERALD pony. These two letters from him are worth reading:

I am writing to tell you how I set about to win the Pony Outfit. As soon as I got my papers I would examine the contents so I could tell my customers what the pages contained. Then I would start on my rounds and miss no one; as our town is small, I could not afford to let one pass. I go to school every day, so you see I had to hustle in order to keep my standing and at the same time keep my lessons to the front. Hoping this will be of some help to other boys, I will close by wishing you every success with your valuable paper.

Yours truly,
FRED BUSH.

"Pals"

At last we come to the quintessence of joy:

I received the pony yesterday. He is certainly a lovely one, and I am very proud of him. He is very quiet. I think I have sold more Christian papers in this community than were ever sold before. I am sometimes surprised myself at the number of papers I sold. I think the pony was viewed by nearly 300 on its arrival, and all claim he is a beauty.

This next letter is apt to make your eyes misty. You understand, of course, that many other prizes are offered besides ponies. That is the ultimate goal. This letter is from Paul H. Bogardus, in answer to a telegram announcing that he had won a gold watch. It is reproduced, spelling and all. It would be sacrilege to attempt to edit it.

506 South Main St.

Gentlemen—

DEAR SIRS; I have received the night lettergram. Do I understand I have won a watch? If so will you please have engraved on it V. Hudson Bogardus and mail to the Methodist Hospital at 7th Ave and 6th St. Brooklyn N. Y.

I want to give it to my brother who is undergoing an operation there. Thanking you in advance, I am

yours Truly
PAUL H. BOGARDUS.

P. S.—If I have one this watch I am going to make a d for the Pony.

Prize Boy

A pony prize is won every month. The boys ha the opportunity, when they have won the prize, choosing whether they want it in the shape of a po or a check for a hundred dollars.

In the "pony man's" mail are found many de cious bits of boy philosophy and boy phraseology:

Enclosed find order. I forgot to send my remittance.

Here is one somewhat hard to interpret at fir blush, but which becomes instantly translucent one slips in a "y" at the beginning of the last wor

One of my customers wants to no would you give me a thing if he took it by the ear.

And so they go:

What number am I in the pony race. I went out Saturd and sold every one in less than half an hour. I am getting alo fine.

Of course all business careers have their days minutes of dire discouragement. For instance:

I am sorry but one of my customers quit to-day. I am havi tuff luck, so I enclose 15c in stamps for next week copies. copies.

The next is from a boy who must stand well his language exercises, though he wants it distinct understood that he is no mollycoddle. We'll ta his word for it, if for nothing else than because spells at least one word wrong; in fact, spells wrong twice.

Now don't think I am a mollycoddle if I tell you, becaus am going to tell you all the same, what I like best about t pin. It is this, it keeps saying to me all the time, "You m good, you made good," and that is a pretty good thing to ringing in a fellow's ears while he is getting his lessons a doing the chores. I like the work just fine, thank you, an thank my lucky stars for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It s alright, alright; my copies go like hot cakes, and I am v sincerely yours

Boys living in small towns have just as good chance, thanks to the fairness and ingenuity of t "pony man," as those living in cities. Besides t prizes won, the boys make a weekly income fr their sales. Hundreds of them have already open bank accounts with their earnings.

Besides Fred Bush, Harold Cahil, Henry A. Cru bling and Percy Huffman ha won first prizes, while some fif young chaps are wearing g watches as a result of their labo and base ball outfits and oth treasures have flooded "Boyvill and added to the joy of nations.

DO YOU KNOW YOUR BIBLE?

MORE than usually interesting has been the contest over List No. 4 in our Bible Study Series. And it is only just to our readers to admit that they have been more than ordinarily successful with the questions, as the large number of correct answers shows.

Readers of all ages are participants in the Bible Study Course. Mrs. D. A. J., of Lewiston, Me., writes: "I am eighty-one years old and have been many years a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I think this latest new feature one of the best." Another, Mrs. J. T. D., West Winfield, N. Y., is seventy-six, and has read the paper twenty-five years. Mrs. H. F., Walnut, Ill., is another "mother in Israel" who finds time to solve the Bible Questions, and who does it well, too. But there are many young folks in the Study Classes, showing that the youthful students are as eager as their elders in acquiring knowledge of God's Word.

R. L., Crisfield, Md., writes: "I have had the pleasure for some years of reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and have noticed with interest your late introduction of a system of monthly Bible Questions, for the testing and developing of the Bible knowledge of your readers. It is certain to prove beneficial to the participants, and perhaps to readers generally." "I am becoming more and more interested and am glad I joined the class," writes Mrs. C. A. S., Bridgewater, Mass. "A splendid idea in your giving THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family of readers a chance to become more acquainted with the Word of God, which is sadly neglected in many instances," writes Miss R. E. L., Pasadena, Calif. "It is a splendid way to teach the Bible," writes J. D. T., Pollock, S. D., "and I am glad your readers are taking so much interest in it."

Many of those who are represented in this week's list of answers are contributors to the Question Class for the first time. We hope that the number will go on increasing from week to week.

MR. TAFT EXPLAINS ABOUT ROME

A Statement Issued by the President on Monday, May 13

"AMONG the insidious methods of attack pursued by some against me is the attempt to arouse religious prejudice on the charge that I am in some manner unduly favoring the Roman Catholic Church.

"It has been my official purpose, first, as the Governor General of the Philippines; second, as Secretary of War, and, third, as President, to encourage every church as far as possible where this does not involve invidious distinctions and does not depart from the rule which separates our state from official relations to all churches. I have unduly favored no church, but have treated them all with absolute impartiality.

"In 1902 I visited Rome and conferred with Pope Leo XIII in an attempt to settle the friar land controversy which had arisen in the Philippines while I was Governor-General, and after a time I succeeded in doing so.

"When last March my aid, Major Butt, set out on a trip solely for his health and proposed to visit Rome, he asked me for a letter of introduction to the present Pope that he might have the privilege of an audience, and I gave him such a letter. The letter contained nothing but a statement of who Major Butt was and an expression of the hope that he might have the honor of being received.

"The only note or letter from the Pope or any representative of his in answer to this letter of introduction which I have received is a cablegram of condolence for all concerned sent by Cardinal Merry del Val by direction of the Pope at the time of the Titanic disaster, and making an inquiry as to the fate of Major Butt, to which I replied expressing my thanks and giving the fact.

"The letter introducing Major Butt contained no reference to the recent appointment of American cardinals and no comment on or reference to the Catholic Church, or any matter relating to it.

"The stories circulating that I have made any inquiry or taken anywhere at any time any part or manifested any interest in questions of social precedence of the recently appointed cardinals are wholly without foundation.

"The evidence that there is a conspiracy for the purpose of arousing religious prejudice against me is shown by the fact that at the instance of some one unknown to me, it was reported in a great many very respectable newspapers that I sent a message of welcome and congratulation to the newly appointed Apostolic Delegate by wireless to the incoming steamer which was bearing him to New York.

"No such message was sent by me or any one by my authority. A denial of the published report was issued from the White House, but the denial has obtained no publicity.

"The statement that I suspended an order made by the Indian Commissioner, affecting the garb of the teachers in certain Indian schools which have been transferred from the Catholic Church to the Government, is true. I did this for the reason that the commissioner had issued the order after consulting with the Secretary of the Interior and without awaiting his conclusions. The propriety of the order has now been made the subject of an open, free discussion by all the parties in interest, and the decision of the Secretary of the Interior will soon be handed down.

"I say nothing of the merits of the controversy except that the order reversed a condition which has existed for years and affected thirty or forty teachers, who as nuns had been long before my time incorporated in the service of the government, and who would be, in effect, expelled from that service by the order should it prevail. They were, therefore, entitled to a full hearing."

Routing Mexico's Rebels

—GENERAL OROZCO, leader of the revolutionary forces in Mexico, has received some severe defeats recently. On May 10, it is claimed, General Huerta, the Federal commander, completely routed the advance guard of the rebel army near Torreon, killing ninety and leaving many wounded. The insurrectos, it is said, were completely repulsed and put to flight and General Villa was sent after them with a troop of cavalry. A few days later, Orozco lost the battle before Conejos. He would not state the number killed and wounded, but it is surmised his loss here must have been severe. He had sent two of his generals, Campa and Artugumedo, with 2,500 men round to the west of Conejos and it is believed the Federal general Teiler engaged them and cut off their retreat. Latest despatches state that Orozco has now taken up his position in the rear of Rellano, a locality considered almost impregnable by the insurrectos, but there is little doubt he will soon be dislodged, as the government troops are mobilizing for an attack.

CHINA COMING INTO THE LIGHT

LETTERS from Christian missionaries in China are filled with news of the encouraging Gospel outlook. Since the inauguration of the republic, a new situation has been created, which promises to afford greater opportunities than at any previous time for the spread of the Gospel.

Rev. Z. Charles Beals of Wuhu, a well-known missionary, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"Those who are acquainted with the great mission fields and their needs know that the greatest need of all is good, efficient native workers. They also know how hard it is to fill that need. Trained evangelists, teachers or medical workers are in great demand, and each denomination has to train its own men. To this end Bible schools are built, where they prepare and send out men and women fitted to become spiritual and intellectual leaders to their own people. Some societies have regular theological colleges, while others have Bible schools similar to those in the homeland. In the first, the student has to spend from five to six years in preparation, while in the Bible schools a bright young man of fairly good education can do efficient work after two or three years' preparation.

"Feeling the great need of these trained workers, we were led two years ago to start with the training of a class of young men. We had a native building of five rooms, and sixteen bright young men, so with this small beginning we started our school. From the first a great deal of attention was paid to the study of the Bible. During the first year, both a Y. M. C. A. and a Christian Endeavor Society were started, which have proved a source of great blessing to the students. The next term we started in with over forty boys, while now we have over eighty, and could have had many more if accommodations had been sufficiently large. To be sure, we added three more rooms last year to the old building; but we doubt if any American farmer would like to risk his cattle in such a flimsily built structure.

"We did the best with the material we had and succeeded in getting a good name for our school. As we saw the crowded rooms and thought of the bright young lives we might be influencing, we prayed that God would help us to secure means to put up the needed buildings.

"This prayer has been answered. Our school building will be 50x80 feet and three stories high. It will accommodate fully one hundred students. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as usual, has had a part in this building. A gift of $636 was sent and was accepted with grateful thanks to the givers. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers must know they have a part in this work, as they have been back of it from the start.

"Many of the young men now in our schools are of the class which will mold the future of this great country. China needs enlightened, consecrated men to teach in her schools, speak in her parliament, serve in her government offices and help elevate the millions. These young men, humanly speaking, have the future of China in their hands. China has tested her so-called religions for centuries, and has found that they are but clogs to her progress. To-day the crumbling pagodas and moldering temples serve as reminders of their failure to benefit China, and the intelligent classes are looking to the West for something better. The government employs high-priced teachers and builds costly schools for the better class; but the majority of the people are neglected, and the students themselves realize that they can gain a much better education in the mission schools, even though by going there they are disqualified from entering the provincial assemblies. Our boys, scattered throughout the country as teachers and evangelists, will be much more useful than we Westerners in reaching the masses of the people. Realizing this, we try to make our schools as efficient as we can, that in them the Chinese may learn how to be the saviors of their own people.

"At the beginning of the present revolution all our students, to a man, volunteered their services to help throw off the yoke of Manchu tyranny. Some of them rose in the ranks, while others filled offices of trust and responsibility. One is surprised to find, as he comes in touch with the officers of this new republic, how many have been students in Christian schools. The first president, Sun Yat Sen, was brought up under Christian influences, and is not ashamed of the Gospel of Jesus. Five of his board of advisers were also Christians. Oh, yes, it pays to teach these young men and women, and we want you, dear readers, to have a share in this great work. Shall we not do our best to send these men forth to carry light and salvation to their fellow men?

"The famine is now sore upon China and will be for another year. Wuhu is one of the great centers where famine relief is being given out. God bless all in the home lands, and may we all be faithful to him and his work, so that when he comes he can say to us, 'Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joys of thy Lord.'"

Helping China's Famine Orphans

MANY friends are showing an interest in the welfare of the famine orphan children of China, for whose support THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is making appeal, and the letters received during the last few weeks are very encouraging. Churches of various denominations, Ladies' Aid Societies, Sunday Schools, Bible Classes, Christian Endeavor Societies, Missionary Societies and similar organizations are represented among the contributors. We welcome the co-operation of these good friends and assure them that the best use will be made of their gifts in behalf of the orphans.

THE TOP OF THE HILL

BY OWEN OLIVER

IT WAS a cold morning, and the wind blew hard, and the rain pattered like hail, when old Mr. Smith set out on his journey to town. He would have stayed at home if things had been going well in business, but they were going badly. So he compressed his thin lips and wrinkled his scanty eyebrows, and pressed his hat upon his white hair, and toiled up Station Hill, facing the wind and the rain.

The hill had been rather too steep for him when he took his house seven years before, and every year it seemed steeper. He had never ascended farther than the railway station half way, but he always meant to go to the top some day. That morning it came to him as a discovery that he was too old to climb the hill alone. He wanted a friendly arm to help him even as far as the station. He stood leaning on his stick and looked up and down the empty road. His breath came slowly and his legs refused their task. The trees that stood out against the skyline bowed as if they mocked him, and the wind jeered:

"You'll never get up the hill! You'll never get up the hill!"

He lowered his head and levered himself forward with his stick. He must catch the train, he kept telling himself. There were so many things to see to, so many troublesome little things. He went on for a few yards, but his heart thumped strangely. He lost himself in a burst of pain. When it passed he found himself holding to the palings and muttering the same thing over and over. "The top of the hill! The top of the hill!" He must get there, he told himself. He must get there! He had forgotten about the train.

He staggered a few steps, and then he caught at the palings again and looked up and down the hill again for some one to help him.

"O God!" he gasped. "I always meant—the top of the hill!"

He heard his umbrella fall. His heart gave a great pained leap. Station Hill seemed to break in two and fall away on either side, and then to rise again out of the ruins and tower in front of him. It was changed again somehow, grown taller and greener and steeper. The bigness of it frightened him.

"I can never climb it alone!" he cried. "Not alone!"

And then he saw that he was no longer alone. A light-haired imp-faced boy stood beside him and pulled at his hand.

"Come, Johnny!" he cried in a childish treble. "Come!"

"Why, Sandy!" said old Mr. Smith. "I've missed you these fifty years! Where have you been, old man?"

"At the top of the hill," said Sandy. "Come, Johnny! Come! Let us run!"

Old Mr. Smith seemed to change suddenly. His legs were young now and he could run. He ran on with his hand in Sandy's.

There were other children who ran with them. There was Bobby, who lived next door; and Charlie, who threw stones over the fence; and Polly, who used to come in to tea, and she boxed his ears for pulling her curls. And that laughing little maid who tossed her head at him was Phyllis Newton, the first little girl whom he kissed under the mistletoe. It was strange that Phyllis should be there, he thought, because she left him a ring in her will, and he had worn it for thirty years.

Other children went and came, but his old friend Sandy always stayed with him. Presently a tall, good-looking lad overtook them and caught him by the arm.

"Melville!" old Mr. Smith cried. "Good old Melville!" It was strange, too, that Melville should be there, because he had grown up and become an army doctor, and enteric had carried him off in India. It was good to meet him. Old Mr. Smith had never thought that the three of them would run again in the line that was famous in the football annals of their school. He found a ball in front of him and kicked it furiously on.

"Run, Melville!" he shouted. "Run, Sandy, run!"

"'Love,' she said, 'can fly'"

He would soon reach the top now Sandy and Melville had come to run with him, he thought. He felt young and strong, and rejoiced as he ran.

At some cross-roads his comrades left him, clasping his hands fiercely for a moment, and then departing one on either side. He walked slowly on, hanging his head and rubbing his knuckles in his eyes. He would never get up the hill now. He was alone! For a moment he seemed to be back on Station Hill—loosening his grasp on the palings and falling. He heard his voice gasp, "Alone!" and then— He was not alone!

A tall, big young lady sprang laughingly from behind some trees and joined him, a very handsome, bonny girl. It was Cousin Kate, who came from India when he was sixteen, the bravest woman whom old Mr. Smith had met in his journey through the world.

"Kate!" he cried. "Dear old Kate! How I've missed you! Where have you been these nine years?"

"At the top of the hill," she answered, "Johnny boy!" He was always Kate's "boy," to the days when he thought that he remembered her as a grand old lady with silver hair.

"Ah, Kate!" he said. "I used to think I'd get there; but I've given in."

"Given in!" Was that Kate's voice or the wind on Station Hill? "Given in! Not my boy!" Oh! That was Kate's voice! Of course it was Kate. And this was Tom Hansom come to help her up the hill, tucking his sturdy arm in her arm and shortening his huge stride to hers. Or did Kate lengthen her steps to Tom's? They were made to travel in double harness, he thought, and he knew dimly that, in days which he had forgotten now, he had often thought this before.

He journeyed with them past three milestones that he fancied were years. Then they went away, with their arms round each other. There were orange blossoms in her hair. She waved her hand to old Mr. Smith.

"Come to us in the holidays, boy dear," she called.

He was rather lonely when they left, but not alone. Old college chums gathered round him, linking their arms in his; and there was old Dr. Mason in his cap and gown, little and pinched and spectacled, fierce of temper and of tongue, and vain with the scholar's vanity, but a man! Old Mr. Smith found himself caught in a narrow pass presently, and his companions laughed and left him. The old doctor came and pushed him through.

"Get out of this, you young fool!" he thundered. "Don't look back! Run, boy! Run!"

He ran stoutly for a time, with the doctor's voice in his ears, but he was lonely, and he grew tired. He had come to a bare waste-land, and the track was littered with great stones. It was a rough, straight track, and a tall gray column marked the end. He knew that the doctor had warned him against turning from it, and that Kate had taught him that straight roads were the only roads. But the doctor and Kate weren't in sight—he looked round to make sure—and the little green glade to the left seemed so pretty and harmless, a little green circle with trees and many-colored flowers and a flower-covered pole, and light-footed nymphs dancing round. The fiddles were playing like mad, and in the distance there was joyous singing. You might as well go through life blindfolded, if you never looked beyond the hedges of the narrow way, he told himself. The doctor was buried in his books and didn't know the world, and Kate was a woman, and women shouldn't. And he was a man!

"After all," said old Mr. Smith, who had grown young, "it's my life, not theirs!" He glanced all round again to make sure that they were not looking, and then he crept through a gap in the hedge and joined the circle round the flower-covered pole.

He danced in the sunlight and he danced in the moonlight. The eyes of the nymphs shone in the moon. One of them bound him with flowery chains —it was afterward that the thorns cut through— and led him away. She put a garland on his head and sang him a beautiful song, and played to him

The Death of Frederick of Denmark

King Christian X.

The Late King Frederick VIII.

Queen Alexandrine

ON the night of May 14 King Frederick VIII. of Denmark was walking alone in the streets of Hamburg when suddenly he was seized with an attack of apoplexy and passed away while being taken in a taxicab to a hospital. Unaware of the identity of the king the authorities consigned his body to the morgue where it lay for five hours before the apprehension of the king's suite caused a search to be started, and the body was found. Queen Louise and three of the royal family who were returning with the king from Nice were immediately told of the fatality, though the word did not reach Copenhagen till the following morning. King Frederick was born June 3, 1843, and married on July 28, 1869, to the Princess Louise of Sweden and Norway. During his father's long reign he was in the Danish army, serving through all ranks till he became Inspector-General. He was sixty-two years of age when he succeeded to the throne. As king he was noted for his absence of show. He was a busy man, for with his wife he was interested in all that made for the welfare of the community. In Copenhagen the king was a familiar figure strolling through the streets unattended, or with one of the gentlemen of his court.

He is succeeded by his eldest son, Christian, aged 41, who married in 1898 Duchess Alexandrine of Mecklenburg.

The Top of the Hill

on a violin. Afterward he noticed that their way was always down hill. The slope grew steeper and steeper, and he tried to stop. Well, he thought that he tried, but he couldn't. At the bottom there was a marsh. His feet stuck, and as he went on he sank. He tried to reach a mound that stood out in the moonlight, but the sides were slippery, and when he struggled to climb them he slid back. Something—some one—was dragging him deeper and deeper in the mire. The quicksands were closing on him.

Kate's face looked down on him from the mound. She was crying as he had never seen her cry before.

"Tom!" she called. "Tom! Hold me. I must go to my boy!"

Her husband put her aside.

"Hold me, Kitty," he said. "I will go down."

He climbed down the slippery bank, and Kate held him, clinging to a stake on top with the other hand. The stake—or the woman—might break, old Mr. Smith knew, but she would never lose her hold on it, or on her husband. Presently Tom seized his hand. He struggled to get away and sink. It was better, he thought, that he should sink, for he could not travel any more with them; but they set their faces, and pulled and pulled, and presently he lay on top of the mound, faint and choking and bedraggled. Kate bent over him. Her tears fell on his face. Or was it the rain on Station Hill?

"Tom will put it right," she told him; and he gave a cry and staggered to his feet.

"It is past putting right," he cried. "I must go my way alone. O my God! Not alone!"

For something — some one — still dragged behind him, as he tried to climb the hill.

Kate and Tom would not leave him, but one night he left them and went on through the dark places, the places that a man must travel alone—alone and with the irrevocable clinging round his feet.

He came to a great wet forest. The branches dripped with the rain and cast it suddenly in great showers, and dark shadows stole among the trees, crept behind him and whispered to him. He fled from them to a place of black night. He hung over the edge of a great precipice, feeling with his foot in the dark. Something—some one—urged him from behind. He would take the leap, he resolved in his desperation, and hung over the abyss shuddering. And then through the darkness there came a little white child.

She took him by the hand and pulled him back from the precipice. She laughed and pressed her wet little lips on the back of his hand. He must find a way out of the dark place for the baby, he thought; and sometimes he led her and sometimes she led him through places of terror. Sometimes she slept peacefully in his arms, while he felt with his feet for a path in the darkness. At last he came to a track on the side of the steep mountain; but something—some one—held him fast. He paid his gleanings on many years of the journey to ransom himself and the child.

He was free, and he had his little white child, and she laughed and hung round his neck as he bore her up the hill. The darkness whitened to fog, and the fog whitened to mist. He slept a little while with the white child in his arms, and when he woke the sunlight was there. The green glade lay smiling below, and the scraping of the fiddles came up to him, and faintly he heard a song, but he turned his back upon it all and lifted the child.

"Come, dear," he said to her; and to himself he said, "You shall teach me to forget." The white child taught him to forget—and to remember—many things; but to his last day old Mr. Smith hated the sound of a violin, and would leave a room if a certain song were sung, and yet the song itself was a beautiful one.

He found some of his old friends again as he went along. Sandy and Melville had taken brave short cuts to the top of the hill, but the doctor was left. He had grown older and fiercer, but the little white child was a queen who ruled him. Kate and Tom came too, and looked at the child, and then they looked at each other. They were thinking that they had no child of their own, he knew; but that was not what they said.

"Bonniest wife in the world!" Tom whispered.

"Luckiest one!" Kate answered. "Dear old man!"

They walked with him again for a time; but the little one traveled very slowly. She was chasing butterflies and shadows most of the time. Kate and Tom had duties that called them and could not wait, and so he and his little white child were left alone once more. They did not need any other company. He almost grudged the hours that she slept, and yet he liked her good-night best of everything in the day for a quaint little custom of hers. When she had hugged him and kissed him, she always returned for one kiss more. "For nex' day," she used to tell him. One night he laid her to sleep for ever, and that time she pulled his face feebly to hers and kissed him with cold little lips. "For nex' day, an' all nex' days after," she told him, and then the clouds opened and a reverent white angel came and carried his white child to a great white city on the top of the hill. Cousin Kate held one of his hands, and her husband held the other; and the grip was so tight that it seemed as if their hands must all break.

"Oh, my boy!" Kate cried. "She will wait for you there."

For a long, long while after this he went on, apart from his friends, fancying that a little white figure walked beside him. It was many days before he noticed that a tall, beautiful woman was often by his side; that quietly she did many things for him; a very beautiful woman, with a smile on her face that was barely a smile, and whose eyes were very steadfast and wonderful. He talked to her, and then he found that her thoughts were wonderful, too; and gradually he learned that she was altogether wonderful. It made his heart strong just to look at her, and warm when she smiled the faint smile that was only half a smile; and one day she sang to him, and the waste places grew green, and brooks danced among them; and then he looked in her eyes, and she looked in his; and the world seemed to reel. They caught their breaths, and she found hers first, and, when she spoke, she was more wonderful than ever.

"We will not say it," she told him gravely; and then she suddenly smiled her faint half-smile. "Oh! But I will! We have been hurt so much that we will not hurt each other, even by silence. You love me, dear. I love you too. I always shall. We met too late on our journey. We must travel by different roads, but at the top of the hill—" Her brave voice broke in a sob. "The top of the hill, dear!" she cried, and lifted her face to his for a moment; and then she was gone. Afterwards old Mr. Smith heard that she had reached the top of the hill before him.

After he lost the wonderful woman he plodded on wearily. He ate and drank and woke and slept. Other wayfarers helped him sometimes, and he helped them. With some he walked in mutual respect and help for a long distance, but his heart had no room for new friends. Tom departed, and he sealed up as holy the room that he had filled. Kate went long after that. There was no need to close her room in his heart. It was always a sacred chamber; the thought of his mother sister-cousin-friend. No one else could ever enter it.

"Dear boy," she said at the end, "you and I are old people, and life has been a little hard upon us. But there is rest on top of the hill. We shall all wait for you there. 'Nex' day an' all nex' days after!' Do you remember that, Johnny dear? He will be waiting. I wonder if I shall grow young again, or Tom will grow old. Tom!"

That was the word which she said over and over; and the last time she said it in her young voice, as if she was a girl once more. She had often spoken like that, old Mr. Smith remembered, when Tom came to her unexpectedly; a soft, deep, laughing cry. "Tom!" It was her old girlish gesture, when she held out her shrunken hands, as if she stretched across the gulf of eternity. "Tom!" she called; and then she leaped with a smile across the great divide. He had no doubt that strong arms caught her on the other side.

It was weary, weary climbing when Kate was gone. He felt older and older. Oh, very old! But people had been kind to him, very kind. Mary, the laughing housemaid, whom he took so young, and who had stayed with him for six years, had been a good girl to him; such a good girl! She had tried to stop him from going out in the rain, he suddenly remembered, and had stood at the door looking, half inclined to run after him. He seemed to see the Station Hill again for a moment, and Mary kneeling on the pavement, and holding his head on her arm.

"He was too old," she cried, "to walk up the hill." She was crying, and her tears fell on his face. Or was it rain? Rain? It never rained like that on Station Hill. It was the rain of adversity coming down the hill of life; the end of the hill that rises like a precipice. He climbed it on his hands and knees, and the sharp stones cut him. He crawled through the brambles, and they brought the blood upon his face, and the rain washed it off again. He could not climb a step further. He was falling. He must fall.

"He is coming to," a voice said. That voice was Dr. Harper's, he thought.

"My dear old master!" said another voice. That was Mary's.

"Come, boy!" cried a third voice. That was Kate's; and it sounded clear and young.

He struggled again for a foothold on the precipitous hill; found it; reached the top! A great white city faced him. The little white child stood in front of it, holding out her hands and laughing. Tom and Kate stood by her side.

"The top of the hill!" he shouted, and started forward! And then he threw up his arms with a great cry. For a deep, dark chasm surrounded the city on every side. There was no way for him to enter there. He sank down on a rock and buried his face in his hands. There was a rustling of wings by his side, and a soft hand touched his shoulder. He looked up; and the wonderful woman smiled down at him; her faint little smile. Even now it was not all a smile, for pity of his weary climbing.

"Love," she said, "can fly!"

She put her arm round old Mr. Smith, and her cheek against him; and suddenly old Mr. Smith was young!

"The top of the hill!" he cried.

And then they flew into the great white city that waits for us there.

Here is shown the assembly of crankshaft and connecting rods; and the careful adjustment of the connecting rod bearings.

Please note the center main bearing and the extra-generous length of the two end bearings. A third crankshaft bearing is unusual in a motor cast en bloc, except in cars of $2500 or higher.

So, in the $900 Hupmobile, the crankshaft has three instead of two supports to help it withstand the strains to which this part necessarily is subjected.

We believe the Hupmobile to be, in its class, the best car in the world.

That this belief is justified, is proven by the large proportion of Hupmobile sales that come through Hupmobile owners and their recommendations to others.

Evidently, no one has shown them a car as good or better in its class.

WOMEN IN COUNCIL

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Naps by Daylight

THOUSANDS of women are far too busy ever to think of taking a nap in the daytime. They would laugh at the suggestion were it made to them. When one tells these busy women that they are nervous and in need of repose, and that they may preserve their youth, strength and charm by taking regular rest by daylight, they shake their heads and smile with pity on the foolish advisers. If a woman's occupation is that of a cashier, clerk or stenographer she has no choice except to devote herself to the task in hand and ignore the fact that she is weary until the allotted time of work is over. If she is a mother with little children making all sorts of demands, she knows very well that her attempt at daytime sleep will probably prove a failure. There are a great many "ifs" that present themselves as obstacles of an insuperable nature when tired and busy women try to secure intervals of rest in the morning or afternoon. Yet it is true that "where there's a will there's a way." Five minutes' or ten minutes' level rest on a sofa will work wonders when one is weary, if only there is perfect relaxation from tension.

The tendency of the American woman is to take life too seriously, and there is not one of us who does not need a reminder that the world will go on long after we have left it, and that tying ourselves up into knots is a most futile proceeding. This old world of ours has seen Eve's daughters going through the process of wearing themselves out since time began. When, the other day, the new excavations at Pompeii gave us another glimpse of a civilization that was at high tide early in the Christian era, there came to the thoughtful mind a vision of men and women as earnestly engaged in the conflicts of life as we are to-day. In an instant they were arrested, and a volcanic storm obliterated for them all further interest in time.

The marvel deepens, as we think of the past, that any of us set so high a value on the present as we do. Far better might we snatch a little leisure as we go along. The woman who is busy for eight or ten hours has her noon spell when she may relax, go out doors and breathe fresh air, and later by dint of determination she may secure a little time for rest before the evening is upon her. The mother of little children may find it inconvenient and almost impossible to secure a period long enough to be much by way of rest. Should she be extremely ill, or if death should snatch her away, somebody else would look after the babies. She will look after them better in her own person if she allows somebody else to relieve her now.

Singularly the most nervous women are not those who are the busiest. The ranks of those who furnish patients for high-priced specialists are continually recruited by society women, by women who have all the time there is to do whatever they please, and by women who habitually neglect the most obvious loss of health. Women are actually vain of being nervous. They tell you smilingly that no one knows how much they suffer. Indigestion marks them for its own. Melancholia threatens them. They are morbid and depressed, and entirely unable to see things as they are. Very seldom do women boast of magnificent physique, of the clear head, the cool hand, and the ability to fulfil every appointment, but nine times out of ten they manifest an almost braggart spirit when they talk about their ailments.

The woman whose nerves are in reality tangled and out of tune is to be commiserated. If she is a woman of leisure she may travel, change the scene, go here or go there, and take her pleasure where she can find it. Very often she would find it soonest by quietly remaining at home. A nap in the daytime sounds prosaic, but it does afford a chance for brain and heart, hands and feet to throw off fatigue and start on the rest of the day with renewed vigor. A good night's rest fairly makes over a tired woman. Sometimes sleep is so coy and reluctant that it refuses to "knit up the raveled sleeve of care" in the hours between midnight and dawn. A theory obtains that sleep in the daytime interferes with sleep at night. Usually this is not so. One may be too weary to sleep at night. By children and young people, invalids and old people, sleep is best gained both as to quality and quantity if they are not utterly worn out upon going to bed.

The best choice for a daytime nap varies with the individual. Sometimes it is well to select a half hour before luncheon. Food is more easily digested and assimilated when the body has had a period of rest than when one comes to the table with depleted brain tissue. If the nervous energy has been very strongly taxed and is nearly exhausted before eating, dyspepsia may be the resulting consequence. To lie down immediately after a meal is not so good a plan as to delay doing so until an hour or more may have passed.

Those who have the care of little children ought to insist on their having time to sleep by daylight. The mother of a child not much over two told a friend that she did not allow her little daughter to take a nap through the day, because she wanted to put her to bed at six o'clock, and be sure that she would sleep all night. The child was high-strung and fretful, thin and pallid, and though she slept all night as her mother wished, she was neither rosy nor plump, nor yet good-humored during the day. The rapidly developing brain was not receiving its proper amount of repose. Until a child is seven or eight years old the wise mother will encourage the habit of lying down for a while every day in the dark, with eyes shut, whether sleep come or stay away.

Keeping a Boarding-House

EVERY one is aware that it takes business talent of a high order to keep a boarding-house successfully. The woman who adopts this method of self-support has two aims in view. She must furnish a home for homeless people and make it so desirable and agreeable that they who come to her as transients may remain as permanent residents. She must supply her table with the delicacies of the season, give her house a home atmosphere, engage servants who shall be equal to their tasks and so run her house that she shall neither incur debt nor fail in securing a margin of profit.

The most comfortable boarding-houses which have loomed up in general notice, houses combining the independence of an inn with the comfort of a private home, have, so far as my knowledge goes, been carried on by Southern gentlewomen in Southern towns. One such, whose ostensible head was a woman who for the first half century of life had dressed in purple and fine linen, and had rivaled the lilies of the field in that neither toiling nor spinning was hers, gave its patrons the impression of being guests at a house party. They were paying guests, of course, but the commercial transaction seemed kept in the background, and the hostess was always on the alert to maintain the friendly relation as if it were what she had most in mind. Her major-domo was a colored man who marketed, catered, supervised the kitchen, and acted as butler and chief of staff, and in every possible manner carried forward the management of the house to perfection. This boarding-house was strikingly in contrast with another in which nobody was comfortable, where the food was poorly cooked and the beds hard and lumpy, while everything had a depressing air of being fit for the second-hand shop. The woman at the head of this second home was equally in need and equally a gentlewoman by birth and tradition with the one first mentioned. She, however, had not a devoted old family servant at her elbow, nor had she the grasp of a situation, the tact and finesse required to keep a group of people coming from different environments contented and cheerful.

The domestic woman obliged to increase her income, and either owning or renting an ample house, naturally considers taking boarders as a way out of financial straits. It is sometimes a way out, but it never succeeds unless business principles are brought to bear on the situation. There must be a return in comfort for the money paid by those who board. There must be a choice of wholesome food, service that is prompt and courteous and everywhere from cellar to attic an absence of dirt and an immaculate cleanliness. The two belong together. A dingy boarding-house is a place from which guests fly. The woman who selects this means of support must be brave, self-denying and not easily discouraged, taking ups and downs with philosophy, and exercising hospitality with a winsome graciousness that makes it a joy to meet her and a regret to say good-by.

Birthdays and Holidays

WE NEED to cultivate the romance of life. We have plenty of realism, plenty that is practical, plenty that is distinguished by hard common sense. In the sublimity of Mother Goose we find couplets and quatrains that are worth repeating. She tells us that

> The king was in the parlor counting out his money,
> The queen was in the kitchen eating bread and honey.

Blessings on the woman who spread her bread and the bread of her children with the sweetness of honey. In the keeping of birthdays and other anniversaries, as, for instance, the wedding day, and the red letter day of a betrothal or a christening day, there is the opportunity and the privilege of cementing home friendliness and adding to a store of cherished memories. Even the baby's birthday may be kept as a golden time in the calendar of the home before the child is old enough to know why people are so glad that he was born. By the time a child has reached the age of two or three the home people may establish a birthday feast in his honor, and this good custom may go on until his years have grown to adolescence and maturity. Mother's birthday, father's birthday, the successive wooden, china, linen, crystal and silver weddings may be celebrated among the home anniversaries. Not one of these should be passed over without special notice. Gifts exchanged on such occasions are not valued for their cost, but for their sentiment. There are many ways in which one may say to a dear comrade on the road, "I love you," and one of the best and most direct ways is that which is accentuated by a little present. The lover and the sweetheart exchange flowers and gifts and the course of their growing regard is marked by many a beautiful token and caressing word. Why should the honeyed sweetness of compliment and the generous outpouring of gifts cease when lover and sweetheart become husband and wife?

An Evening Prayer

THE day is done. My little task,
O Lord, is laid before thine eye.
And I did fail, forgive, I ask,
Before in slumber deep I lie.

Each hasty word, each dumb mistake
That pierced thy heart and gave thee pain,
Do thou forgive, for Jesus' sake;
And cleanse my heart from every stain.

Then I shall rest, and fear no ill
'Mid quietness, though tempests roar;
Secure in Christ, for he shall fill
My heart with peace to flowing o'er!

And if thou callest me above
Ere from my slumbers sweet I wake,
Enfold me in thine arms of love,
O Lord, I ask, for Jesus' sake.

Busy Cozy Corner Days

1. Each day should be distinguished by at least one particular act of love.
2. You cannot tell how pretty the sunrise is with a morning frown on your face. And smiles drive trials miles away.

ALL SOLDIERS' DAY

Cover them over with beautiful flowers,
Deck them with garlands, those heroes of ours;
Pay them the tribute they earned in the strife;
Give them the laurels they won with their life.

THE best way for boys and girls to pay tribute to the gallant soldiers whose loyalty and valiant fighting the nation celebrates on Memorial Day is by being soldiers and as faithfully fighting the daily little battles of duty and honor as they fought the brave battles of their day.

Summer Handiwork

THIS is just the season for designing the patterns for your embroideries, and you need no further depend on art embroidery stores for stamping. Pretty leaf doilies for finger-bowls and glasses are much in vogue. Select a perfect ivy leaf or spray of leaves, and cut your pattern from it. Outline the design on linen or coarse crash, drawing it lightly with a pencil. Nothing is easier. Put your leaf and linen against the window-pane, and after getting the outline of the leaf carefully trace the main veins of it, and copy the color and shading as nearly as possible in embroidery silk or mercerized cotton. The veins should be worked in single outline stitch, but the edges of the leaf should be buttonholed to a width of an eighth of an inch.

A Jackdaw That Goes to School with His Master, Joe Butler, and Never Lets Him Get Out of Sight

Boys should busy themselves in odd moments this time of year by making and setting up trellises and vine supports and simple garden things. Try it and see what good fun and fine out-of-door work it is. Get an old wooden chopping-bowl, bore several holes in the bottom to insure drainage, and fasten it to the top of an old tree stump or fence-post. Whittle a hole in the bottom of the bowl, insert a broomstick handle, fasten up strings as shown in the picture. You will be surprised at how beautiful it will look when the vines, English ivy especially, cover it all up.

Pretty Doily Design

The Real New Year

THE world, old as it is, is ever newly made in May, and no fairy tale bubbling with fancied mystery is half so wonderful. To brave the magic of the new year and to follow its call in our own lives is gradually to realize that within ourselves lies the power to broaden and deepen the gladness of the world.

The flowers and the insects, the birds, the trees, the fishes, the stones, and I doubt not the very stars themselves have each their magic experience of the new year. The northern bluethroat, frail journeyman of the skies, typical in many ways of the race of little birds, at the call of the new year hurls himself with myriads of his kind high into the air beyond the reach of enemies, and in one dauntless flight travels from his winter haunts in South Africa, half way round the world to the new-year nesting-trees in the islands of the Northern Sea. During the dark of the first May moon a million seals and more swim with the velocity of railroad trains through leagues and leagues of deepest ocean, from no one knows where, to the Pribilof Islands, where at the call of the new year they start new nurseries along the rocky coasts and invent new sports season after season.

A Vine Trellis

People who are constantly trying to explain things give many reasons for the phenomena of the new year and its place in the world's activities. But somehow I care very little about their explainings. That at some unerring call the deep gives up its strange treasures; that the sunshine of life stored in the wild heart of the bird sends him hurtling into the air and in a twinkling the bleak North rings with his song and the hearts of people are gladdened: and that I too may answer the mysterious summons: this is enough for me; I have but to join the common chorus of the new year, and during the precious May-time of my life so store my girlhood with the sunshine of courage and usefulness that, like the northern bluethroat, I shall add my share to the gladness of life, and by God's grace shall reveal something of the blessed love and mystery that rule the world.

And next week I am going to tell you something about two little ladies of Wales, who so stored their girlhood with sunshine and gladness that all the mystery and sweetness of the world was added to on their account.

For Our Little People

TOPSY-TURVY WORLD

IF the butterfly courted the bee,
And the owl loved the porcupine;
If churches were built in the sea,
And three times one was nine;
If the pony rode the master,
And the buttercups ate the cows,
If the cat had the dire disaster
To be worried, sir, by the mouse;
If mamma, sir, sold the baby
To a gipsy for half-a-crown;
If a gentleman, sir, was a lady,
The world would be Upside-Down.
If any or all of these wonders
Should ever come about,
I should not consider them blunders,
For I should be Inside-Out!

IN GOD'S SERVICE*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WE HAVE come now to the closing part of Jesus' Sermon on the Mount, where he gives a home thrust at his hearers by saying, "He that heareth, and doeth not, is like a man that built a house upon the earth without a foundation; against which the stream brake, and straightway it fell in; and the ruin of that house was great" (Luke 6: 49, R. V.). We must put ourselves in the place of those who listened to Jesus if we would understand the meaning of his words. We will ask them to tell us about the manner of building to which Jesus referred, but they will say: "We have a hilly country, and it is our custom to build our houses on hilltops or on hillsides, and we build mostly of stone; very little wood enters into the construction of our houses. The stone walls and floors of our houses are thick and heavy, and therefore we must have strong foundations. We do not build these foundations in the surface earth, but we dig down until we reach bedrock, from twenty to fifty feet down, and we secure our foundation to that rock; then our houses cannot be moved by the torrents of water that rush down the hills when the heavy rains come. If we had laid our foundations in the surface earth, our houses would have been carried down with that earth loosened by the torrents, and fallen to pieces over our heads." By this illustration Jesus meant to teach his hearers that if they simply listened to his words they could not be steadfast in Christian character, but only as they joined themselves to him, and co-operated with him.

If Jesus had been talking to a company of people like ourselves, accustomed to entirely different ways of building, he would not have put his truth just that way. Can we imagine Jesus standing in front of the frame of one of the twentieth century steel structures that we are accustomed to see reared before the outer covering of stone or brick is put on? We think he would note how, as the huge frame is going up, strong pins are put in, which are afterward replaced by rivets, until the whole is welded together. Putting in the pins might be compared with listening to words of teaching, and the riveting process, with following the teaching by deeds done In His Name. Some years ago a large hotel was being put up in Washington. The riveting stage did not follow closely enough the pinning stage, and the structure fell to the ground with a crash that was heard in almost the whole city. Sometimes we have been startled by the downfall of persons who are known as church attendants. Perhaps we did not investigate their lives sufficiently to know that they were not compacted, fitly joined to Christ "by that which every joint supplieth" (Eph. 4: 16).

"Ye Are God's Building"

Or take another illustration from the city of Washington. This time it shall be the Washington Monument itself. Can we imagine our Christ standing there fifty years or more ago? It was then in an uncompleted state, hardly reaching one-quarter of the height designed. Its foundation had been found to be giving way. In the centennial year, 1876, it was a patriotic act of Congress to create a commission for the purpose of completing the monument. A marvelous engineering feat was accomplished by which a new foundation was laid without taking down the part of the monument which had been built. The new foundation was two and one-half times greater than the old one, and the monument was built of granite, faced with marble, to the height of five hundred and fifty feet.

Before such an imposing structure as this might the apostle Paul have stood when he said, "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ" (I. Cor. 3: 11). "We are laborers together with God, ye are God's building" (I. Cor. 3: 9). And we hear our Christ saying: "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me" (John 12: 32). What a glorious height our human life will reach if we are building on the Christ foundation, and earnestly, constantly endeavoring to do all he has taught us to do! And how "glorious within" (Ps. 45: 13) will be those who are one in him! Let us then remove the inadequate foundation of self-righteousness, for upon that we shall be able to build a very small part of the structure of true godliness, only so much as will be but a reproach, as was the Washington Monument in its uncompleted, tottering condition. If we are building our characters on self-righteousness we are "deluding ourselves." Read the Golden Text in confirmation of this.

Stones of Character

And on that day when Jesus talked about building, he pointed out some beautiful stones that should go into the fabric. There was one that had the flash of the diamond, for one who would lead others in the right way must have the light of God's truth in his own soul, else he would be as the blind leading the blind.

There was another stone which Jesus pointed out, that clear shining emerald, for one who would lead others must be clean, for the scholar is not above his teacher.

There was another that had the strong, true blue of the turquoise. "Whatsoever things are true, . . . think on these things" (Phil. 4: 8). "Ye therefore, beloved, seeing that ye know these things, . . . beware lest ye also . . . fall from your own steadfastness" (II. Peter 3: 17).

There was another that had the tender glimmer of the pearl, for one must be gentle and good and sweet before he can show others their faults. "Cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote that is in thy brother's eye."

There is another stone (the opal) which seems to have a heart of fire out of which all dross has been burned. Jesus spoke of "the good man, who out of the treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good."

The entire seventh chapter of Matthew should now be read to complement the passage we have been studying in Luke. It is the same story, but it is more fully given, and so we shall find additional light upon the teachings of Jesus. Let us also read what James the brother of our Lord has said upon this same subject of Hearing and Doing. Although not an apostle, it is not unlikely that he was among the listeners when Jesus preached his Sermon on the Mount. His words have the Christ-spirit in them:

"Be ye doers of the Word, and not hearers only."

It is a psychological law that every impression should be followed by expression, otherwise there will be a weakening of the will. It is the same principle of hearing and doing set forth first by Christ and then by James. We have in mind a beautiful picture of a boy receiving his first plowing lesson. He has placed his hands on the plow, and he has an earnest look upon his face; indeed, that feeling seems to permeate every part of his being; it makes his hands grasp the plow more firmly, it gives his feet a strong look. Behind the boy stands his father. He has one hand on his boy's shoulder, and with the other he points in the direction where the boy is to plow, and he is saying, "Plow a long furrow. Make it straight." And Jesus says: "No man [or boy] having put his hand to the plow, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God" (Luke 9: 62). The earlier the boy begins to plow, the better plowman he will make; the earlier he begins to be a doer of the Word the more capable and honorable he will be in the Master's service, and the more joy he will find in life. What is true of boys is just as true of girls. Out of every Sunday school lesson they receive they should learn something to do—how to make the lesson work.

The Mirror and Forgetfulness

"If any be a hearer of the Word, and not a doer, he is like a man beholding his natural face in a glass and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was." Briefly put, it is thus: When one hears and does not do, he very soon forgets what he has heard. A person told that she had a smudge on her face, but not whether it was on her forehead, her cheek, or her chin, might look into the mirror again and again to see where it was, but it would have done no good if she had not made an effort to remove the spot. So it will be with those who go to church and Sunday school; they are taught there to see themselves in the mirror of God's Word—how sinful they are and how much they need a Saviour—but if that does not lead them to living a white life, the mere hearing about it amounts to nothing. To forget is a careless and indolent habit at any time, but to forget what is told us about our individual relation and responsibility to God is a sin of the deepest dye.

"He that looketh into the perfect law of liberty, being not a hearer that forgetteth, but a doer that worketh, this man shall be blessed in his doing" (James 1: 25, R. V.). The perfect law of liberty is the Gospel rule of life, and we live according to it, not when God's will is our law—for then we are a noble kind of slaves—but when God's will is our will; then are we his free children. Planets have their orbits through which they move without seeming control, but they are held in place by the so-called center of attraction. The law of liberty is the Christian's orbit, but he is held by the love of God, his center of attraction, and it is his greatest joy to do just the things that God expects him to do. He does not wish to move in his own way, he would rather walk with God in the dark (not knowing) than to walk alone by sight.

Dr. Joseph Parker says: "The stars have no freedom except in their obedience to their central fires; related to the dominant suns let them swing like censers before the altar of God's throne; but if they detach themselves and go to seek liberty they shall find it under the name of ruin." We have a Bible, and must abide by it; we have a doctrine, and we must understand it with the heart, and exemplify it in the life; we have a glorious liberty—"If the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." Even Jesus himself was obedient to his Father, for he said, "I seek not mine own will, but the will of him that sent me" (John 5: 30). And the pleasure he had in that obedience was shown when he said: "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to accomplish his work" (John 4: 34).

"Pure religion and undefiled before our God and Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep oneself unspotted from the world." The sun and stars following their orbits give light upon the earth, and they are thus a blessing to mankind. In like manner the good we all may do as the days are going by is the light which we may shed as doers of the Word. The widows, the fatherless, all who suffer, are God's poor; it is the will of our heavenly Father that not one of them shall perish, and he is looking to us to extend the helping hand in his name.

We're as rich in charity of deed
As gold: what rock would bloom not with the seed?
We give our alms and cry, What can we more?
One hour of time were worth a load of ore!
Give to the ignorant our wisdom! give
Sorrow our comfort! lend to those who live
In crime the counsels of our virtue! share
With souls our souls, and Satan shall despair!

Teaching the Lesson to Children

The three little Japanese bronze monkeys are familiar objects with most children—one, with two hands over his eyes, saying, "Look at no evil thing," the second with his hands over his ears, saying, "Listen to no evil," and the third with both hands on the lips, saying, "Speak no evil." It might be well for the teacher to show them to the children, and afterward say, "Our Bible teaches us better things, that we are not to close our eyes, but to keep them open to read what God would have us do; not to cover up our ears, but to keep them open that we may hear what our fathers and mothers and teachers can tell us about all good ways to please God; not to keep our mouths shut, but open them to speak God's words, and kind words to all who need our loving help, and the hands themselves instead of closing anything should themselves be kept open to do all the good they can.

Called Higher

Kate E. Potter (42), of Byrdton, Va., was called to her heavenly home on May 16, 1911. She was for more than ten years a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mrs. A. A. Galleher (93), of Baker City, Ore., was called to her heavenly home December 21, 1910. She had been for a long time a subscriber to this paper.

Zuld Graves, of Norwood, La., after three years of sickness, passed to her rest on March 15, 1911. She dearly loved "the dear old paper" which was for many years a welcome visitor to her home.

Mr. Samuel Hammond (75), of New York City, was suddenly killed by an automobile on June 22, 1911. He leaves a widow and one son, a lieutenant of police. The deceased had taken this paper for many years.

Miss Caroline Augusta Fabens (87) passed away in August, 1911, at Salem, Mass. Through this paper to which she subscribed for many years, she was particularly interested in the Bowery Mission and many other charities.

Mr. P. B. Messenger (76), of Hampton, Va., died June 29, 1911; and his wife passed away in the same month, aged seventy years. They were both devoted church members and readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

George P. Lovell (84), of Orange Bend, Fla., and his wife Mary A. (76) died on December 29, 1910, and March 23, 1911, respectively. They were both devoted church members and for a number of years readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Plant Wonders from New Mexico

FREE FOR CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS

WE have secured from our newest State, New Mexico, some marvelous Plant Wonders. They can be successfully grown, both indoors and out. These rare and beautiful plant forms are the "Old Man" Cactus (Pilocereus senilis)

WONDERFUL RESURRECTION PLANT

Resurrection (Closed)

This is one of the strangest plants of the vegetable kingdom, possessing the power of turning in a few minutes from a comparatively dead dry herb to a beautiful living plant. It grows in the wilds of the mountains of Mexico. As shipped to you in its dormant condition, it looks like a dead, dried up herb curled up in the shape of a ball. Place it in a saucerful of water and in twenty minutes or so it begins to "resurrect," the leaves open out, until within an hour it is a beautiful fern-like plant of dark green color, living and growing as roughly indicated in the illustration. These plants will open out to a width of 6 or 8 inches.

This Mexican Resurrection Plant will retain its wonderful qualities of resurrecting for an indefinite length of time. It may be taken out of the saucer of water at any time and laid on a shelf, when it will dry itself up into its dormant dry form, and remain like that for years, still retaining its wonderful qualities. At any time it can be brought forth, placed in a saucer of water, and will again come to life.

Resurrection Plant (Semperviva), Open

"OLD MAN" CACTUS

This is truly one of the greatest curiosities of all plant life. It is a species of true cactus which, in well developed specimens, exactly resembles the hoary gray-haired head of an old man; hence the name of the species. Pilocereus is a genus of the cactus family distinguished from the other sorts by the fact that the spines on the plant take more or less hair-like forms. Some of the species have both stiff and hair-like spines. In this species of senilis, however, all the spines take the form of long silvery white hairs, which completely cover the upper portion of the stem, as shown by the illustration. These hairs attain a length of several inches, as shown, and instead of spreading regularly or stiffly as in other species of this genus, they are soft and flowing, thickly covering the stem. This species of cactus is not very hardy out of doors, but we offer it because it is such a rare, strange curiosity of the cactus family that many wish this extraordinary species because it always attracts the attention and surprise of one who sees it; and for this reason is well worth the little extra care required to keep it protected from frost. It can be grown quite well out of doors, except during freezing weather.

The Golden Cactus (Echinocereus dasyacanthus)

THE GOLDEN CACTUS

This cactus grows from two to ten inches in height and varies in color from white to rich dark purplish red, making an exceedingly handsome appearance even when not in bloom. It is, however, a good bloomer, flowers being large and numerous, two or three to the plant coming out from the side, as shown in the illustration, and being from two to three inches across. They are of a rich showy yellow, the center of the sepals red and the petals a bright yellow. The plant forms clusters and is very easy to grow.

Rainbow Cactus (Echinocereus pectinatus)
Enormous flowers, shading magenta to white

THE RAINBOW CACTUS

This rare species of cactus is probably the most beautiful of all cacti. It is a variety which is remarkable because of the great success with which it can be grown in any part of this continent, and especially in the house. The plant itself has bands of delicate spines which range in color from creamy whiteness to deep red, forming rings of bright red or bright red and white, encircling the plant and making it most ornamental even when not in bloom. Its best feature, however, is the profusion and beauty of its flowers, which grow so closely together (as indicated by the illustration made from life) that they cannot fully expand. The plant from which this illustration was made bore thirteen blooms, all open at one time, each bloom measuring from four to five inches in diameter. The flowers are of the prettiest colors imaginable, the outer circle being a deep purple and rich magenta shading to white and again to bright green. The stamens are orange, contrasting beautifully with emerald green pistals.

SUNSET

From the Painting by G. Sagantini

Ivory Soap in the Laundry—the Washing of Colored Clothes

TO wash your colored clothes clean without having the colors run or fade, first of all you should bear in mind the things that cause the trouble; then adopt methods which eliminate or offset these things and, at the same time, have the necessary cleansing power.

The things which harm colors are: 1st. Boiling the clothes. 2nd. Exposure to sunlight. 3rd. Hard rubbing. 4th. Strong soaps. 5th. Water itself, in the case of very delicate colors.

The effect of water can be offset, as you know, by setting the colors before washing. We give some good directions below.

When you are sure that water itself will not harm the colors in a garment, the way to wash it thoroughly and safely is to use Ivory Soap as suggested in the following paragraphs. Ivory Soap is pure. It contains no "free" (uncombined) alkali. It will not harm anything that water itself will not harm.

The Procter & Gamble Co.

Ordinary Colored Clothes

Fast Color—Make a warm suds of Ivory Soap. Quickly wash, rinse and hang out to dry one garment at a time. If the water is colored by the goods take fresh water for the next garment.

Never rub soap on the goods; nor the goods on the washboard—except wristbands, neckbands and the edges of hems if badly soiled.

When dry, turn garment wrong side out and starch in thin starch. Shake into shape and hang in shade.

When dry, dampen and roll up garment a short time before ironing.

Whenever possible, iron muslins, prints and ginghams on the wrong side.

When the Color is Not Fast—Set it before washing by soaking for a half hour in a solution of salt, white vinegar, borax, or alum, one level tablespoonful to a gallon of water.

Another way to hold the color without setting it is to wash as follows: Shave a small cake of Ivory Soap in a pint of water. Add a large tablespoonful of salt. Boil slowly a half hour. When cold, it will be like jelly.

Wash the garment in cold water using this jelly freely. If badly soiled, wet the garment, rub with the jelly and lay aside for a few minutes before washing. Rinse thoroughly and dry in shade.

Delicate-Hued Muslins, Cambrics, Prints, Etc.

Soak for ten minutes in salt water, a half cupful of common salt to two gallons of cold water. Wring out and wash quickly in Ivory Soap suds. Rinse in blueing water. Starch in boiling starch. Hang in shade.

Lawns, Organdies, Batistes, Etc.

Wash in warm, weak Ivory Soap suds with salt in suds. Rinse twice in hard water with some salt added. Make smooth, thin starch and put this in last rinse water with a pinch of powdered alum.

Silk Muslins

Wash with tepid water and Ivory Soap. Rinse. Blue if necessary. Use thin, cool starch and hang indoors in dark place.

Brown Linens

Pour boiling water over a quarter pound of cheap coffee. Strain through cheesecloth into two tubs, one for washing the other for rinsing. Wash with Ivory Soap. Rinse and hang in shade to dry. Iron first on wrong side and then on the right. Do not use blueing.

Black Goods—Cotton or Silk

Dissolve in a pint of soft water a small cake of Ivory Soap, shaved fine. Add

½ oz. ether, ½ oz. spirits of wine,
½ oz. glycerine, 1½ oz. ammonia.

Put in a bottle and cork tightly. When needed, shake well. Add a teacupful of above cream to two gallons of water. Use plenty of Ivory Soap and wash the same as other goods. Rinse well in clear water. Iron silk goods on the wrong side, while wet. Dry cotton goods, then dampen.

Towels with Colored Borders

Do not let them become badly soiled. Rub gently with Ivory Soap. Rinse in warm water and then in cold water. Wash quickly. Do not soak or boil.

TO SET COLORS

Black and White Mixtures and Grey—Before washing, soak for an hour in salt water, a tablespoonful of salt to a quart of water.

Green—Soak for ten minutes in a solution of alum, one ounce to a gallon of water.

Light Yellows, Light Blue, Pink and Red—Add one tablespoonful of salt to every quart of rinse water.

Lavender, Purple and Heliotrope—Use vinegar in rinse water, one tablespoonful to every quart. The vinegar will restore sunfaded lilac and lavender.

Blue—Soak for several hours (over night if possible) in solution of sugar of lead, one ounce to a gallon of water.

HINTS

If a garment dries unevenly, roll up in an old sheet with the sheet between each turn.

Mixed plaids should be washed a piece at a time.

Do not use blueing with pink dresses. Run them through two clear waters.

At first washing, dry colored ginghams and wash goods before starching.

Dainty lawns, etc., to have body, must be removed from the line as soon as dry or the wind will make them limp.

Never let the sun shine on a wet, colored fabric or let it lie in folds

Sledge and Dogs Ready for the Journey

A Midwinter Scene at Ohak, Labrador

On the Journey with Sledge and Dogs

A PERILOUS ARCTIC WINTER JOURNEY

BY CHRISTIAN SCHMITT

Nain, Labrador

I FEAR this letter, sent to you in December, may not reach you before May, after it has been nearly five months on the way. As you know, the Labrador coast is now in the grip of winter, and a cold, arctic winter at that. Snowstorms are a matter of almost everyday occurrence. Traveling is therefore slow and extremely difficult. Labrador has not progressed with the outside world, and while people are discussing the probability of crossing the Atlantic by airship or aeroplane, locomotion here is still as it was hundreds of years ago. Dogs and sledges are still employed, and while our contemporaries farther south speak of traveling two hundred miles an hour, we are content to cover from thirty to sixty miles a day.

If this letter, when it reaches your hand, could tell all its experiences on its long and perilous journey through the wilds of Labrador, you would no doubt be interested and surprised. The first part of the journey it is entrusted to the care of some Eskimos who carry the mails by sledge and dog-team south. Storms, a lonely snow hut on the side of a hill, great wastes of ice and snow traversed—all would combine to make the story of the letter's travel interesting. Farther south, the letter will pass into the hands of some Indian tribes who cross the continent from east to west and north to south. At times these Indians have queer notions about the small parcels of letters entrusted to them. Occasionally our letters reach us after being cut open, and we are informed that the Indians open them because they suspect that something has been written about themselves. An Eskimo woman traveling with the mail-sledge once took the whole parcel of letters and threw them into the sea at the ice's edge, firmly believing that the main contents related to herself.

Some time ago, I accompanied the mail-sledge in the dead of winter. Mid-winter traveling has this advantage, that we can go more or less in a straight line, as the high hills or deep bays offer no insurmountable obstacle, the snow on the former and the ice on the latter affording a safe and welcome passage. In summer, the heads of the bays have to be traversed, or if traveling by boat, the headlands have to be rounded, which usually means going many miles out of your course.

On this particular journey, we crossed a bay and on the other side entered a deep ravine, which slowly ascended to a range of high mountains. Being in January, the days were short and the way was poor, as the wind had drifted the soft snow into the valley, making our progress tedious. Before we reached the height of land it was night. We were now about two thousand feet above sea level. Here we halted, and my Eskimo drivers consulted what to do. The way before us was dangerous at the best of times, as it led down steep inclines and there was no other way to descend these hills and reach the salt-water ice below.

Under ordinary circumstances the men would not have been troubled, but would have built a snow hut and put up there for the night. But a shower of rain had spoiled the snow so that it could no longer be cut into blocks to form the walls of the snow house, the top having a hard crust, and below this the snow being too brittle and crumbling to pieces. The same shower of rain had faced the steep mountain inclines with a coating of ice which made our way both slippery and dangerous. In addition a strong northwest wind sprang up, which drove loose particles of snow into our faces. The result of my Eskimos' deliberations was that they could not stay, but would have to proceed on the journey. Some time in the night they hoped to reach a small Eskimo hut, about five miles distant, down at the foot of the mountains.

They first searched for a secure place and, cutting a sufficiently large hole in the ice, they put me into it and requested me to stay there. Then they unharnessed the dogs and let down the sledges by ropes, otherwise they would have been smashed against the large rocky boulders. Meanwhile the storm continued to howl and the snow drifted past me; occasionally I would hear the men shouting to one another as they lowered the sledges down the precipice. As their shouts grew faint in the distance, I began to feel uncomfortable and cold, and longed to have some one with me. For once in my life I was heartily sorry that I was not an Eskimo, as I should then have had a better knowledge of the circumstances and could have helped in the work. I could not see three yards around me, as the snow was drifting thick and fast, although the night was now somewhat illumined by a full moon. After some time (it seemed hours to me) I decided to leave my hole, but no sooner had I ventured on the slippery ice than I was sliding

RELIEF FOR THE FLOOD VICTIMS

AMERICA AWAKENING TO THE VASTNESS OF THE CALAMITY IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY

MORE and more pressing and urgent come the appeals for aid from the great flooded districts of Louisiana. Just when it seemed that the worst of the trouble was over and that the care of the thousands gathered in the refuge camps was the greatest problem, another break in the levees took place at Alto on the Atchafalaya River, about twenty-one miles from Melville. Though danger at this point had been feared by the levee guard the night before the break, it was a great surprise when on the following morning the embankment gave way, and with a mighty roar a miniature Niagara rushed through the levee to the lowlands beyond. Only twelve hours later this crevasse had widened to six hundred feet and was pouring in a mighty flood into an entirely unflooded section of the country. When the news of this break reached Melville preparations were rushed forward to transport refugees to places of safety and to save the stock of the merchants. The army officers who are superintending the administration of relief work at once ordered barges and other boats from Baton Rouge to this newly affected district.

The break in the levee at Hymelia, which put such a note of discouragement into the telegram of Governor Sanders that was quoted in our last issue, has caused a great deal of added anxiety and has, as was expected, forced thousands more into the refugee camps. The work of rescuing those marooned by the sudden rush was successfully carried out, and almost immediately efforts were made to close the crevasse. Two days after the first break the loud roar of the water rushing into the lowlands could be heard a mile away. Motor-boats loaded with supplies and equipments were rushed to the scene as rapidly as possible and desperate efforts were undertaken to close the ever widening breach. The section that was affected by this break, which is known as the Bayou Lafourche district, is the most densely populated of all rural sections in the United States, according to the latest statistics. There are three hundred and sixty-two people to the square mile, practically all of whom draw their livelihood from the sugar and cotton growing industries which the disastrous flood has paralyzed for this year.

The relief work in progress from Vicksburg is being carried forward as thoroughly and as rapidly as possible. Ten thousand rations were recently forwarded to the flood sufferers in the Sunflower River district, and two hundred and fifty thousand rations, the largest load sent out from that place during the relief work, were shipped for distribution from the relief base at Greenville. There are still about one hundred thousand refugees reported in the Vicksburg district, all of whom are dependent upon the government relief or upon outside charity.

Throughout the more western part of the flooded Louisiana territory the backwater behind the levees has continued to rise rapidly. Even before the break which so seriously affected Melville, the streets of the town were flooded to such an extent that all transportation and business was carried on by boats, and its only connection with the rest of the world was by telephone or boat. From the Bordelonville district the officer in charge wired that the situation was growing still more serious, as the water was running over the government levee for a distance of two or three miles. He stated that the loss of live stock would be very great unless barges for its transportation to safety were rushed in at once.

The progress of the flood waters into the back country has been astoundingly rapid. From points miles back into Lafourche and St. John Parishes, where the water has in former less disastrous floods taken weeks to penetrate, have come the reports that the farms were flooded two or three days after the levees broke. Hurried and desperate calls for assistance have come from various parts of these parishes and from Assumption Parish, where people have been unexpectedly marooned.

A despatch from Napoleonville states that the residents of six river and bayou sections in that vicinity have all been compelled to flee from their homes on account of the flood water. The cane growers throughout the district have seen the year's crop go under water and there is slight hope that any of it will be saved or that the flood will recede early enough to permit the planting of a second crop. The waters from the disastrous crevasse at Torras have continued to spread until the farthest points in the river and low-lying parishes have been reached. Even the back levees of some of the plantations—levees which were built as precautions only against the most extreme conditions—have gone down before the pressure of the waters backed in from the crevasse.

From the delta district of the Mississippi the reports are more encouraging as far as the progress of the water is concerned, but are disheartening when the details of the conditions of terrible distress of the small landholders and those who are dependent upon them are realized. Here the loss of live stock has been very severe, and as the water recedes the small farmers find their land once more ready for use, but their homes are practically wrecked. Many are without the cotton seed necessary to put in a new crop, and still others have lost every farm animal that they owned, leaving their planting and other farm work practically paralyzed.

From the refugee camps come the stories of the needs which it is impossible for the government officers to meet. A message from one of the army medical officers stated that in many places small and unorganized camps had been formed and in these the sanitary conditions were very bad. He asked in the same message for large supplies of clothing, and urged that in some way medical and sanitary aid be rushed to the districts where the danger of disease is greatest.

In spite of all that the efficient officers are now doing to improve conditions and prevent starvation among the homeless and destitute there is a great deal of suffering, and before normal conditions are restored this suffering must develop to almost unthinkable proportions if outside relief is not forthcoming. Large amounts of the government grants must go for the repair of the levees and not for the immediate relief of those affected by the floods. Their homes must be, in some way, gotten ready for their return. The government's relief in the form of food can be temporary only. The concentration camps can be continued only for a certain length of time, and it is feared that between the breaking up of the camps and the harvesting of another crop which will provide the wherewithal to refurnish their homes and purchase the necessities of life there must be intense suffering unless large sums are raised by private subscriptions to tide over the destitute till the fall. In a private despatch from a prominent citizen of Natchez we find some statements which indicate the extent of the calamity in that immediate district, and its conditions are only those which prevail throughout the whole fifteen hundred square miles of flooded country. The despatch says, "There is much suffering. The great majority will be absolutely destitute when the government withdraws its rations. I think that funds to be raised to be spent for the actual needs, to relieve sickness and distress will be a real charity. There is no chance for these people to make a crop . . . and the suffering after the government withdraws its rations, in my opinion, will be beyond description."

The army has done splendid work in handling supplies, forming refugee camps, and rescuing survivors; but on others devolve the tasks of maintaining order, regulating sanitation, nursing the sick and providing for the babies that have been born in the army tents. Gradually all these people must be re-established in their homes, and that will be the biggest task of all. There is need for money—urgent need, for money in generous sums.

The money which has already been forwarded by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has now been used by the governor's committee in Louisiana, and it is our sincere hope that we may be able to forward substantial relief on behalf of our subscribers at an early date.

All gifts for the flood sufferers should be sent as early as possible, addressed to down a steep incline, right in among my Eskimos. They did not know what to make of it. Their first thought was of a polar bear sliding down the hill; but they soon discovered who it was and reproached me earnestly for leaving my safe place above, as it was little short of a miracle that I had not done myself bodily harm.

After this they no longer insisted that I should stay alone in a hole, and an experienced man was despatched to lead me down. My guide walked ahead of me, cutting holes in the ice to make a foothold on the steep and slippery inclines. The Eskimos are little in stature and have, moreover, small feet and hands, which I was soon destined to find out to my detriment, as the holes cut were sufficient for Eskimo feet but not for mine. Very soon I was again sliding ahead of my guide into the darkness. At the time I wore a thick fur cloak and did not suffer seriously from the bumps I received by coming into sudden contact with protruding rocks. As soon as I came to a standstill I had to shout to my guide (I could not see him) and he shouted back to me. In this way we were soon able to enjoy one another's company again. Eventually we reached the foot of the hill in safety, and my heart was grateful to God for preservation over the most dangerous part of our winter's journey.

We stayed the remaining hours of the night in the little Eskimo hut, and the next day we reached a Moravian settlement. Our friends were anxious about us on account of the storm and all were glad that, notwithstanding the many adverse circumstances, we arrived in sound health and good spirits.

THE JOY OF TRUE SERVICE

TEXT: "And his servants shall serve him: and they shall see his face; and his name shall be in their foreheads." Rev. 22: 3, 4

THE first part of this text seems to be a commonplace of the most obvious kind. "His servants shall serve him!" Well, why not? What are servants for except to serve? And you expect his servants to serve him. In this what is there wonderful or new or striking? And the reflection of a single minute suggests to us that we cannot have all the meaning of it before us. There must be something else. As the marvelous apocalypse moves toward its climax—this book which has been crowded with martyrdoms and heroisms and world-shaking catastrophes and judgments and the unspeakably precious promises of our God—it is not likely that the swelling sentences which rise as billows of light out of emerald seas of splendor will sink down upon such a poor and nerveless phrase. "His servants shall serve him!" Why, of course. But is that all?

You might think from the use of the same word "serve" and "servant" that the same word is used in the original. That would be a very reasonable supposition. But it is by no means the case. And the entire meaning of the words is lost to us because it has not been found possible to make the distinction which the writer made. The English Revised Version has made the attempt: "His servants shall do him service"; but there is little gain in the change. The word for "servant" expresses the lowest kind of servitude. The servants in question were slaves, and those of the lowest order. But the word for "serve" represents the very highest kind of service, and in the New Testament is exclusively applied to service rendered to God. It is frequently used of the ritual service of the temple. It describes the worship of God freely offered by loving and adoring hearts. And it is used for that true service of the Infinite and Holy One which consists in the consecration of the whole life to deeds of love and mercy done for him—the service which Mazzini had in mind when he declared, "We worship God by serving man." And the idea of the text is that from the lowest service the believer is promoted to the highest; from humiliating and painful and even degrading toil he is elevated to a place amongst the great and greatly honored souls who greatly serve the world. The slave becomes a priest—a priest of the Most High!

Work in the Glorified Life

In the glorified life of the blessed which John sees in his vision, the lowest have become the highest, and slaves become priests by virtue of service and of sacrifice. These, he says, are they that have come out of the great tribulation—not "out of great tribulation" as we often read it. You must not leave out the definite article. They have come out of the great tribulation—out of that agony of persecution which has made the name of Nero a synonym of horror for almost twice a thousand years. They, too, fought a good fight, kept the faith, finished their course. And having, in the days of supreme trial, supremely served, and that through supremest sacrifice, they now receive the crown of life, and it is—what? Larger opportunities and ampler powers for nobler and more enduring and richer service! His bond-slaves shall be his priests!

So, then, this is the first lesson of our text. The reward of good work is not freedom from work. It is more work, of a higher and better quality, with greater joy in the effort, and keener satisfaction in the accomplishment.

In this regard we have only to think of the heavenly life as a continuation of the earthly. It is a continuance of it under perfectly natural and logical conditions. And we may well believe that laws we here find operative in the universe will still have course though time shall cease to be. We find it to be a law here that work well done does not bring surcease of work. It brings more. Every man who is really busy seems, to the first glance, too busy. The rule is that a man either has too much to do or too little. He goes under and joins the unemployed, or else activities, engagements, burdens, crowd in upon him until you would think, and he thinks, sometimes, that he must be crushed beneath them. If you want to impose obligations and duties upon a man, it is of no use going to one who is care-free at the present time. You must go to the one who is doing so much that he cannot do more! And he is the one who can do it! We are told that we ought not to whip the willing horse. We should apply the whip to one who is doing nothing. Possibly the whip, if applied with sufficient vigor, might be effective with the people who will not work, but nothing else would be. And you have only to name the men whose personalities are always in the public eye, the great leaders in the financial world, the captains of industry, the makers and teachers of men, with all the hosts of the statesmen, preachers, men of science—the minds that lead the mind of the nation—to see that those who have done the world's work have their reward in—more work yet to do!

The Joy and Inspiration of Work

But the point is, of course, that such work is of a higher quality. There is work which brings—altogether aside from the rewards and emoluments which follow—immense joy and pride in the doing of it. And there is work which—aside again from its unremunerative nature—has in it only a minimum of joy and inspiration. It is work, and that of a strenuous character, which produces The Origin of Species and The Ascent of Man; which creates Hamlet or In Memoriam; or paints "Madonnas" and "Last Judgments." It is work exhausting enough in all conscience to direct the labor of thousands, manipulate properties in which the comfort of millions of people and the fate of millions upon millions of treasure are alike involved. It is work to sit hour by hour at the desk carrying on nerve and brain a hundred separate enterprises on the issue of any one of which fortune or ruin may depend. It is work to go from sick-room to sick-room, looking at the pain-racked body, pitying the tortured mind and pouring out the life in love and helpfulness. And—to speak a word for one's own vocation—it is work, though you may not believe it, to make oneself at home with the best thoughts of the best men of all ages, to saturate these in one's own deep convictions, and to pour oneself into one's preaching to the brains and hearts of men. Such work may be as exhausting, as devitalizing, as the labor of him who wheels iron ore to a blast furnace eight hours a day, or feeds the voracious fires of an Atlantic liner, or drives a street car through crowded streets from morning till night, or holds a collier's helm on a lee shore in the teeth of a January gale. But what inspiration there is in the one—what lack of it in the other! There was wisdom as well as wit in the remark of the workingman to a bishop who was arguing against an eight hours' day prescribed by law. The bishop said, "Why, I myself work fourteen hours a day," and I have no doubt he spoke truly. But quick as a flash came the retort, "But if I liked my work as well as you like yours I should be glad to do forty." The whole story is there. I am not asserting that there is no joy, no inspiration to be found in the lower forms of work. I am asserting what everybody knows, that there is more joy and inspiration in these we call higher. And we have agreed to call them higher just because they call for the grandest exercise of everything that is grandest in us, and they have the promise of deeper joys and higher achievements yet.

Willing Service in Church Work

It is good for us to take this view of the work we are called upon to do for God. Too often we are ready to complain, or, at the very least, to feel a little bit resentful, of the tendency of church work to grow upon us. Brethren, count it a reward offered to you by the Great Head of the Church. Esteem it his recognition of your faithful service, of your high integrity, of Christian character acclaimed by your fellows and attested by God. And you, who have done good work on a dozen different committees, and begin to wonder when the demands of the church upon your time will cease—take the heroic view of this and believe that it is God's way of acknowledging your service and of crowning you. He says, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter into the joy of your Lord"—and the joy is in yet larger work to do for him which you shall do even better than you have done the last!

And it is good for us to think these things of the blessed life. Did you suppose that it was rest? Why does any person want rest at any time? I can only think of two reasons:

Rest may be longed for as the end of sickness, weakness and misery. If life has gone very hard with a person, and sorrows have multiplied, and misfortunes have followed one upon another, and if there seems no outlook and no hope; if body and mind are alike exhausted, then it may seem that there is nothing in the world so much to be desired as rest—the end of all things.

And the only other reason I can think of why rest should be desired by any of us is as a period of recuperation after healthy fatigue and as a means of storing up fresh energy for new tasks. Rest is delightful then. It is earned. And it is enjoyed. But it must not last too long, or it becomes a weariness to the flesh, and we demand some toil to rest us from its infliction. There comes renewed joy in renewed toil.

But now suppose this: Suppose that there is promised to you first the rest which you have deserved and which you need. With rest comes reinvigoration. Then great tasks await you, and as your spirit bends to them in glad obedience you find to your delight and surprise that you are possessed of faculties and powers adequate to your tasks. The work grows more and more important. It assumes ever larger proportions and takes on wider-reaching, eternal significance. And with the labor your powers increase, and you are always above your work, and never beneath it. There is no stress and strain. There is no sign of effort on your brow. Were there pain, the labor you delight in physics pain; and the joy of accomplishment you share with God. Would not that be heaven indeed? And such, I would have you think, is the glory of the redeemed.

Fellow Workers with God

Now, believe me, you cannot have a heaven in the next life if you have none in this. You must not hope to be enrolled with the heroic workers of the future beyond the night which we call death if you are not taking your place honorably amongst such toilers here, and working while it is called day. Churches are not clubs. The religious life is not self-indulgence. God does not grudge you your happiness, but you have no right to be happy, and God will not let you know what real happiness is, except as you are trying to help him to help his world. But if you will to do this— But listen to the next clause in the text:

"They shall see His face." I am quite sure that the two ideas are connected. Indeed, may we not say they are inseparable? "No longer do I call you servants," says our Lord, and the word is the same, "bond-slaves." "No longer do I call you slaves; for the slave knoweth not what his lord doeth." He cannot understand. He is not supposed to understand. He has only blindly to obey. And the scourge waits for disobedience. "But I have called you friends"—friends. And such are we, friends of God, entering by intelligent and reverent sympathy into the mind of God, understanding what our Lord doeth, co-operating with his eternal purposes, becoming fellow workers together with God in serving and saving his world! "O God, I am thinking thy thoughts after thee," said Kepler in his joy when his telescope swept the heavens. "I can sympathize with God," said Tennyson; "I can sympathize with God in my poor little way."

Familiarity with God is promised us. It is not only contemplation. "They shall see his face." What is a face? Is it not a revelation? Is it not a revelation of the mind and soul? The face is the supreme product of evolution. What ages have gone to the making of man and to the creation of that marvel of marvels, the human face! "All the greatest painting," says Ruskin, "is of the human face." And why? Because, as Plato so long ago declared, in the face is the consummation alike of the physical and the moral. We may not always be able to read it, yet the face is the face because

THE GATES OF PARADISE

NOT here, but farther, lies the land
Whose beauties tongue cannot command;
There, in that land of brightest day,
Peace, truth, and right dominion sway;
And there, beneath those beaming skies,
They stand—the gates of Paradise.

There pain and sorrow never show
Themselves to those who here below
Seemed weighted to the ground with care.
That bliss eternal we may share,
If we would only will to rise
And seek the gates of Paradise.

So far away they lie, they say,
That we must travel many a day;
The months must fly, the years must go;
The journey's end we may not know;
Life's vista long before us lies;
Its end—the gates of Paradise.

The way is arduous, narrow, rough,
And difficulties come enough;
But, being such, it is the best;
Then onward go; pause not to rest,
Until behind each sorrow lies;
Before—the gates of Paradise.

The Joy of True Service

the soul speaks in it. "And they shall see his face," and know his mind, and share the secret counsels of the Most High.

But our ambition grows by what it feeds on. Every promise fires our longing for another. And this does not content us. Here the blessing must begin. "His name shall be on their foreheads." There is upon God's children the character which bespeaks God's ownership.

The thinker knows that "there is nothing of which a high nature feels so proud as the possession of a human soul." Compared to this, the ownership of material wealth seems itself material, and very poor, however great the riches owned. Such possession of the heart and spirit of another is the very "climax of conscious power." And when a loving heart pledges itself, in Browning's fine phrase, to > Meet, if thou require it,

> Both demands,
> Laying faith and spirit
> In thy hands,

all is told, and in that wealth is a vastness and a glory which the ownership of all the gold of California and all the silver of Nevada could not bring.

Dare we not think of a joy and pride and rapture in the heart of the Eternal to which these feelings afford a clue? If the adoring heart yields itself to God; if the will is surrendered to him; if we come to offer ourselves to him with no reserve and no delay, keeping back no uttermost recesses of the soul, but finding the largest service and the largest sacrifice all too small, who shall say that heaven's own gladness does not take on a richer hue, and the joy which is found amongst the angels of God over one sinner that repents prove to be but the faintest adumbration of the glory which is in the heart of God in the possession of the souls of men and women consecrated to his will? I dare not follow this flashing vision into the immensities and the eternities to which it invites me. My mind begins to reel and stagger before the contemplation of such august and awe-inspiring themes. I understand the mark which is to be on their foreheads. It is reverence that kindles in the soul and speaks from the face. It is adoration which transfigures the countenance. It is a God-like character which lights up the radiance in eyes that look with love upon the face of God. Oh, may I reach this purest heaven—be to God himself a possession in which through all eternity Immortality and Infinity may delight! May we his bond-slaves become his priests, and the humblest of us all through the ages of the ages sit with those that praise our God for that they served his world!

JOY TO THE WORLD

By Eugene Thwing

JOY is not a thing of spontaneous combustion. No more is it a thing that is sent like rain "upon the just and unjust" alike. We sing with enthusiasm "Joy to the world!" and then go about our own business as though we had pronounced a benediction, and henceforth the world ought to be filled with joy. Somehow, as we look around, everything is the same as before.

Why isn't the world joyful? Surely there is joy enough for all somewhere. Surely there is reason enough for all to rejoice. Yet a large part of the world is sorrowful, and seems almost to prefer sorrow to joy. The things that cause sorrow are deliberately chosen rather than the things that cause joy. Our own tuneful proclamation of joy to the world seems to produce no result. Perhaps "heaven and nature sing," but when we get through our lines,

> No more let sin and sorrow grow,
> Nor thorns infest the ground,

we look here and there and we find that sin and sorrow are still growing rank, and thorns still infest the ground on every side. Then, perhaps, if God has given us the blessing of common sense, it dawns upon us that something more than singing "Joy to the world" is necessary to bring it to pass.

Joy is not an accident. It must have a definite cause. You and I may safely assume that in some particular case within our reach, where now there is sorrow, if joy is to come at all we must be the cause. Somebody has said, "Joy is born a twin." That means, first of all, that it is a living thing. Next, it means that it cannot come into life, nor remain alive, nor grow, alone. Partnership is absolutely indispensable to joy. Christ begat his joy in the hearts of his followers, "that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full," and then he immediately commanded them to beget joy in others as he had begotten joy in them, because loving, certainly, is the one necessary step toward making joy. If, therefore, we are acquainted with Joy, the sooner we translate our songs into action and introduce our own boon companion to some one who has not met him the better.

QUEER, what places one must go to find the haunts of Joy. The bright and happy Spirit ought, of course, to be out among the flowers, and sunshine, and music, or it ought to be in some gay banquet hall, or quiet library, or superb gallery of art; or we ought to find it in some bank with piles of gold, or in a drawing-room surrounded with elegance and clothed in beautiful raiment. Thousands of searchers are convinced that the nearer they can get to such places the closer they will come to grasping the hand of Joy.

A faithful city pastor had within his flock a discontented woman. She lived in a fairly comfortable and well-appointed home, and she and her family were always respectably clothed. They mingled freely in good society and had many friends, yet the good woman was unhappy. She saw many of her neighbors with greater luxuries than her own family could enjoy. Every new indulgence of a neighbor or friend in an automobile, or expensive gowns, or costly entertainments, or travel, or summer outings, gave her a fresh sense of her own restricted condition and made her feel that fate, either in human or inhuman form, was most unkind.

What could a poor man, even though he be a pastor, do for the healing of such a malady? Sermons could not reach it. The subject required tactful treatment. How could joy be begotten in such a house of gloom? Contact with brightness and beauty and pleasure seemed rather to aggravate the disease.

Finally the pastor's wife found the answer. She persuaded the lady of sighs to go with her, just for company, to visit a sick woman living in a miserable tenement in the poorest quarter of the city. The room was bare of carpet and almost destitute of furniture. The cupboard was empty, and two half-naked children were crying with cold and hunger. The few simple comforts, but more, the heartening words of sympathy and hope, which the pastor's wife brought into that cheerless place, made the sick woman's face shine through her tears as she stammered again and again words of gratitude and blessing.

THE visit was repeated the next day, and the lady of sighs volunteered to provide a part of the things needful. Other homes of wretchedness were visited in the same way, until the lady who had been chosen by the pastor's wife as her special companion for the round of visits exclaimed, one day, "I had no idea you did so much of this work, Mrs. Fisher. It seems to take most of your time."

"I have not, until recently," acknowledged the pastor's wife, "but there is so much need, and in our own comfortable and beautiful homes we are so inclined to forget the multitude of suffering and sorrowing ones whom we can help so easily. I just felt this was necessary to counteract selfishness as well as to minister to "the least of these" in His name. I am not sure but I have gotten a good deal more than I have given."

The other said nothing, but somehow her own home seemed a place of luxury as she began to compare it, not with the mansions of wealthier neighbors, but with the pitiful tenement rooms in which she has been so often of late. Her own privileges and blessings seemed by the same reversal of standard to be multiplied beyond all count, where before they had been thought so few. As she noticed the glad look that sprang into poor wan faces when she entered a seemingly destitute room on her errand of mercy, she felt a strange glow in her heart unknown before. When one day, calling alone because the pastor's wife was unable to go, a poor old woman looked into her face with eager, tender eyes that seemed beautiful in spite of the deep lines of pain and poverty, and said, "Lady, may the dear God bless you, and bring back on your own head a thousand times over all the joy you are bringin' to the likes of us," suddenly she realized she had found something new and wonderful. Joy had been born in her.

We need not speculate as to whether she or the old woman had begotten the joy in the other, or whether the pastor's wife had given it, or whether it came direct from the Master as a reward for obedience, or whether all three propositions were true. Certainly the partnership in joy was there, and certainly the joy was a living, throbbing reality.

That is a beautiful, jubilant hymn—"Joy to the world!" We just naturally sing it with an exultant spirit. How would it be, next time, to sing it also as a consecration pledge?

THE HEART'S WISH

A LITTLE more Cross and a little less creed,
A little more beauty of brotherly deed;
A little more bearing of things to be borne,
With faith in the infinite triumph of morn.
A little less doubt and a little more do
Of the simple, sweet service each day brings to view.

Swedish Christians at Work

THE churches for foreigners in New York City are institutions in which every citizen of America should be interested. There are many agencies and influences in the metropolis which tempt and threaten the immigrant. During the days or weeks he spends there before going on to the interior of the country his hopes of good citizenship may be ruined. His first few weeks in the new world are very likely to determine whether he is to be a loss or a gain to the United States.

For twenty years the Battery Swedish M. E. Mission has stood just east of the green, outside of Castle Garden, and its workers here sought to help the incoming strangers from their native land to a safe and steady start upon their new life. The little society has done a noble work, a work which makes the whole nation its debtor. And among the people of the Swedish race who have located permanently in New York its services have been also invaluable. It is holding them firmly to the Church of Christ, while helping them to learn how to make the most of their lives in their new homeland. It is also doing a splendid evangelistic work among the members of the Swedish race who have drifted away from Christ, as well as visiting the sick and supplying the needs of the poor.

The operations of the church have increased so largely that its people have found it necessary to move to new quarters. The new location is on Twenty-fourth Street, near Ninth Avenue. It is the ambition of the faithful members to own their own church home, and out of their earnings they have already established a small building fund, which they are earnestly hoping may grow to a sufficient size to enable them to purchase the property they are now occupying. The work of the church is under the direction of the New York Church Extension and Missionary Society, which is also a subscriber to its new enterprise. The society now supports its own minister and deaconess.

Any who are interested in this good work and who wish to learn more of its prospects and its needs are invited to communicate with the pastor, Rev. Carl J. Andreen, at 2427 Seventh Avenue, New York.

Lykabettos, the Remarkable Cone-shaped Hill That Rises Almost from the Center of Athens

MILTON in Paradise Regained calls Athens "The eye of Greece, mother of arts and eloquence." To this very day, during the long period of her decadence and eclipse, and of her subsequent revival as the political capital of an independent country, Athens has maintained something of her traditional glory. To speak of a city as the Athens of America, of England, of Germany (and the inhabitants of many cities like thus to fondly designate their towns) is to claim for it a certain literary and artistic superiority, even though the golden age of Athens is 2,500 years in the past.

In St. Paul's time the gleam of this golden glory was still reflected on the proud temples and magnificent statuary of Athens, even though she had become a conquered Roman province, and, commercially and politically, was far less important than her neighbor, Corinth. Nevertheless, she stood in the eyes of the world for all that was excellent in art and letters, and the approach of the great apostle to her famous shrines and academic groves was a unique event in his life, and, as it proved, in the history of Christianity. But what do we see now in Athens, nearly two thousand years after St. Paul walked up to the Agora from the Piræus, between the ruins of the great stone walls that used to connect the noblest city of antiquity with her seaport? Corinth is a ruin, as we have seen—a ruin but partially exhumed by the enterprise of American explorers. "The Isthmus," once the highway of the world's commerce, is largely a rocky waste, with a few fertile farms and smiling vineyards to tell of its former glory. The Isthmian stadium is but a hollow in the ground, where once the greatest sports took place that commanded the attention of the nations. But Athens, like the phœnix, has arisen from her ashes over and over again, and, though she has lost her classic glory, is in some respects more important to-day than in St. Paul's time. Then she was a quiet provincial town, full of philosophers, idlers, and questioning speculators, of little importance in the political or commercial world, but with all the memories of her former commanding greatness and with her glorious monuments and works of art largely unimpaired. Now Athens is surpassed by a hundred cities from the intellectual and artistic standpoint, but none can rival her memories, her traditions, her ruins. To-day she is no longer an insignificant free Greek city of a Roman colony, as when St. Paul visited her. She is the capital of an independent kingdom—a kingdom small and poor, to be sure, as compared with her great neighbors, but a kingdom that is enjoying a more just and stable government than she has known since the days of the Apostle. She boasts a constitutional government, a wise and patriotic king, and a legislative assembly representing a free people.

A Squatter's House on the Acropolis

The finances of Greece are on a more stable basis than ever, a sure proof of the commercial welfare of a nation. The drachma is the monetary unit of her currency. It is worth twenty cents in American money, the same as the French franc, the Italian lira, and the Austrian corona. For many years the drachma passed only at a heavy discount, as compared with the currency of her neighbors; but it is now worth a trifle more than the money of the wealthy French republic.

Athens is enlarging her boundaries, erecting new public buildings and hotels, repairing her streets, unearthing her ruins and restoring some of them, and everywhere there are signs of growing prosperity. But this is largely a commercial prosperity. The center of literary and artistic activity long ago moved from Athens, probably never to return. Apart from a few fine buildings, the palace of the king and the crown prince, the great Stadium, the Academy, the university, the library, the homes of Professor Schliemann and a few wealthy Greeks, the architecture of Athens is monotonous and depressing in the extreme. A square packing-box seems to be the model of ninety-nine houses out of a hundred. Hideous rectangular buildings, white-washed or yellow-washed, with unrelieved flat roofs, abound everywhere in the more respectable parts of the city, while the poorer parts are often squalid and filthy. Athens is Greece in a peculiar sense. Far more than Paris is France, even more than Buenos Aires is Argentina (where almost all the wealth and fashion and luxury are centered in the capital of the republic) is Athens the center, if not the circumference, of modern Greece. There is no other city deserving the name in Greece, and the country villages are often dirty, dismal and wretchedly poor. When we consider the sad history of Greece for the last two thousand years, we do not wonder at her present poverty, but rather that she has shown such wonderful resiliency, and has been able to take her place, though as a little one, in the family of the nations. Twenty-four hundred years ago, approximately, Greece was at the summit of her glory, four hundred years before St. Paul climbed the long ascent from the Piræus, and preached his immortal sermon on Mars Hill. Then, within a period of seventy years, lived Socrates, who drank the hemlock in the year 399 before Christ, and Plato, his great disciple, who died fifty years later; and Demosthenes, the name synonymous with oratory in all the world; Aristotle, and Diogenes the Cynic, and Praxiteles the sculptor, and many another whose name the world will never willingly let die. Within the lifetime of a single man all these great orators, philosophers, painters and sculptors lived. Philip of Macedon then conquered the Persians, and Alexander the Great ascended the throne. Then came to Greece a steady though slow decline from the summit of her fame and glory, until, as we have seen, in St. Paul's time Athens was a quiet provincial city, with only the shadow of her former greatness, though the splendid monuments of her architects, sculptors and painters were still intact. But worse things awaited this devoted city and country after St. Paul's day. The Goths ravaged Athens in the fourth century after Christ, and the Vandals a hundred years later. The Vandals were followed by the Slavs, after another century had performed its work of destruction and pillage. Then the Bulgarians

THE MOHONK PEACE CONFERENCE

THE eighteenth annual Lake Mohonk Peace Conference was held from May 15 to 17 last, and brought forth an attendance that was truly international in character. Representatives from Persia, Switzerland, Canada, Germany, the United States and Norway were gathered there in the interest of international arbitration. The sessions were devoted to a consideration of the scope and value of the courts of arbitration, the value of arbitration treaties, and the duties of this nation as the leader in the peace movement. Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler of Columbia University presided at the sessions again this year. In his opening address Dr. Butler reviewed the history of the Anglo-American and French peace treaties with special reference to the action of the Senate. He spoke in high praise, also, of the diplomats who averted war in Europe's trying crisis of 1911. On the second day of the conference Dr. Otfried Nippold, professor of International Law in Berne University, Switzerland, spoke on "Winning Germany for Peace." He said of the difficulties to be faced:

The endeavors to secure world peace can only be fully successful if all nations take part in them.

The chief work must be done in Germany. For if we have taken Germany, we have taken the world. That is the last, the hardest fortress to be taken. The German public in general takes no interest in anything connected with international law, Hague conferences, arbitration, the peace movement.

The third day of the conference was devoted largely to the awarding of prizes, the consideration of the questions which most closely affect the United States and the adoption of a platform for the conference.

Announcement was made on the closing day of the conference of the inauguration of a nation-wide movement to link the churches of the United States up to the movement to secure international peace, now before the conference.

A commission on peace and arbitration of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ, composed of well-known representatives of the churches, has been formed to conduct the campaign, the purposes of which are, briefly, to organize all the churches of the nation into a great Church Peace League, and in all possible ways interest the ministers and churches in the peace movement.

Steps will be taken to organize the 18,000,000 persons represented in the Federal Council into a Church League of Peace.

and the Albanians took their turn at the work of pillage and rapine. Even the Norwegians came down from the far north about the year 1000 and contributed their share to the desolation of fair Athens.

Worst of all, in 1456, the Turks captured Athens, and then this city of ancient glory and modern disaster was the football of Mussulmans and Christians, Turks, Venetians, Russians, British and French, until in 1830 Greece was declared an independent nation, and in 1863 the present worthy King George I. ascended the throne, to which he had been elected by the voice of the people. He is a brother of the late King Frederick VIII. of Denmark, and a brother of the Queen Mother Alexandra of England. Under his reign Greece has, though with various internal troubles and defeats by foreign foes, steadily progressed, materially, educationally, and, we trust, spiritually.

When we consider her checkered career, her long, long centuries of defeat, oppression, pillage, destruction by the most barbarous nations of Europe and Asia, we cannot wonder that Athens is to-day chiefly celebrated for her ruins; that not a single temple is still intact; that not one of the thousands of ancient statues is unscarred; that headless trunks, armless and legless fragments, broken capitals, friezes and pediments abound everywhere, and that even the Parthenon and the Erechtheion retain but the shadow of their former glories.

Yet here is to-day a modern city of some one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, supremely interesting to the student because of its history, to the artist because of rare fragments of sculpture, to the archeologist because of its majestic ruins, stately even in their decay, to the Christian largely because a Christian Jew, named Paul, some eighteen hundred years ago journeyed here from Macedonia, tarried for a few weeks or months, and on a great rock in the center of the city made a never-to-be-forgotten speech which ever since has been echoing throughout the world. On all these accounts it is of interest to look at the city for a little through modern spectacles, uncolored by the rosy light of the past or the gloom of more recent years.

In the modern city of Athens there are two squares which form the two foci of an ellipse, from which most of the life of the city radiates. One of these is Constitution Square, to translate the Greek and French names by which it is usually called into English, and the other is the Place of Concord. Around Constitution Square cluster the leading hotels, while to the east it is flanked by the great bare marble palace of the king, in front of which is a pretty park, and behind it a botanical garden.

From the Place de la Concord radiate various electric car lines to different parts of the city, and the two squares are connected by the Street of the Stadium, a busy thoroughfare about half a mile long. Other principal business streets are the Street of Hermes, the Street of Æolus, Athens Street and Piræus Street. In all these and some others are good shops, filled with the latest importations from London, Paris and New York. The student of the classics will be interested to note that many of the streets are named after the ancient worthies, Homer and Socrates, Æschylus and Phidias, and is thankful to the city fathers of Athens for putting up at every street corner a marble tablet with the name of the street in plain Greek letters, a custom which many of our American cities might well imitate more extensively.

The street scenes are extremely interesting to the new arrival. The ladies of Athens of the better class affect a funereal black, for the most part, at least, in this year of our Lord 1912. What it may be next year I would not venture to predict. But there are enough other people on the streets to relieve the somber effect. The soldiers are particularly picturesque. Many of them wear the kilted and fluted white skirt that comes nearly to their knees, while their legs are encased in heavy white stockings or leggings reaching to their hips. This costume, which terminates in brown Turkish slippers, extravagantly turned up at the toe, which is surmounted by a big black ball of worsted, gives these sons of Mars a singularly unwarlike, not to say effeminate, aspect. But there are other soldiers in blue and butternut uniforms of the ordinary type, while the officers, as in other lands, are birds of gorgeous plumage.

The bootblacks and newsboys of Athens are numberless and omnipresent, yelling out in shrill tones the latest edition, or inviting customers in equally strident tones to have a "shine." Hot-chestnut men, with a charcoal brazier and stock in trade of a hundred big nuts, doze over their little fires, or sell pistachio nuts, sesame seed or pumpkin seeds at the street corners. Much of the merchandise is carried by diminutive gray donkeys, or by old women, who are almost lost under their huge loads of oranges or lemons or cauliflowers or brushwood. The goats are a familiar sight of modern as doubtless they were of ancient Athens, and one sees them skipping over the rocks of Mars Hill or the Pnyx, or picking their way gingerly over the ruins of some ancient temple, like chamois in their native wilds. They are all muzzled, and attended in flocks of ten or a dozen by a goatherd, who goes armed with three little tin cups, one holding about a pint, another a half pint, and another a gill. When he finds a customer, he stops a section of his living milk-cart, milks it, hands over the diminutive amount of the lacteal fluid (it certainly is fresh milk) to the customer, and receives his five or ten lepta (one or two cents) in return.

Such are some of the everyday sights which interest the modern traveler in Athens. But of course the natural scenery and the ruined monuments of ancient greatness are the sights which chiefly attract his attention. These are memorable and striking in the extreme. To the east of the city is a long range of granite hills, bare and stern, with scarcely a vestige of vegetation, at least in winter, but famed now as in classical days for their honey, the honey of Hymettus. To the north is the great mountain range of Parnes, covered with snow after December's winds begin to blow, while between Parnes and Hymettus in a northeasterly direction is Pentelicus, the marble quarry of ancient and modern Athens alike, the mountain which made possible the magnificent temples and statues of ancient days, which has adorned the modern stadium, before described, in its glorious dress of glistening white, and which has given to modern Athens all the beauty and glory which it still possesses; for even to-day it is a city of marble. It is not too much to say that with all its wonderful geographical advantages, without Pentelicus there could have been no Athens such as we know in ancient or modern history.

Coming nearer the city, the most striking natural object is Lykabettos, a hill nearly one thousand feet high, which rises almost out of the heart of the city. This is a wondrously symmetrical cone, and the view from the top is magnificent in the extreme. A much lower height to the south is the far-famed Acropolis, or citadel of Athens, crowned with the world's most wonderful ruins, the Propylæa, the Parthenon, the Erechtheion, and the Temple of the Wingless Victory. Beyond the Acropolis, looking toward the south from Lykabettos, are the blue, sparkling waters of Piræus, the chief harbor of Greece nineteen hundred years ago, as now.

From this harbor might have been seen, somewhere near the former date, an unnoticed, apparently insignificant foot passenger, making his toilsome way alone over the long, dusty road that led from the shore to the heart of ancient Athens, which then was the Acropolis and the land that immediately surrounded it, a section now almost bare of habitation. That solitary man was Paul, once called Saul; and he bore a message which should turn the world upside down. What he saw and what he said I must reserve for another article.

Salvation for All

IN the good old days of rugged dogma one of the favorite battle grounds for preacher and laymen alike was the subject of "election." Not so much is heard about it nowadays, for the clergymen of the various denominations have gotten down to the working basis of preaching salvation as freely offered to everybody. The glad "whosoevers" of the New Testament have sung the grim interpretations of other and more difficult passages out of earshot. Every man who hears the Gospel knows in the depths of his soul that he can be saved; every man who hears the Gospel knows that God longs to save him.

It is stimulating and strengthening, however, to find the old passages which were somberly interpreted in the old days clarified by new and authoritative voices of learning and piety. In the published correspondence of Professor David Smith in the columns of the British Weekly appears a letter written by one who speaks modestly of himself as "an ignorant collier," and asks for an explanation of John 6: 44: "No man can come to me except the Father draw him." The collier suggests: "The inference is—a man cannot do anything for himself in coming to the Saviour; and if he does not come, it is because the Father has not drawn him. Is this a correct deduction?"

Professor Smith answers: "Hardly," evidently from what follows, connoting a most positive negative. For he goes on to say what is much easier to believe than to doubt, that the Father is drawing every one. He continues:

> If he were not drawing us, we would never think of him, never realize our need, never long for a better life. What, then, is the correct inference from that saying of Jesus? It is this: "No man can come to me except the Father draw him; and the Father is drawing every man; therefore every man may come to the Saviour, and if he does not come, it is because he has refused to be drawn by the kind hand of the Father, and resisted the striving of the good Spirit."

Even the baffling passage in the eighth chapter of Romans melts into sweetness before the warmth of Christian experience. Every Christian knows that he was called. He can still remember the time God called him and many of the occasions on which the call was repeated. He knows that God had him in his thought and planned for his salvation. He knows that his destiny, determined by the Almighty Father, was that he "might be conformed to the image of his Son." He knows that he was and is "justified"; he knows that he will be "glorified." He knows also that any other soul who will hear and heed the call may have a share in this same glad destiny and the same great glory.

A New Religion for Japan

THAT Japan is growing more tolerant and liberal in its national attitude towards other religions than Buddhism and Shintoism, was demonstrated recently by an important conference—the first of its kind ever held—at which the Western religions were accorded the same official recognition as those of the ancient East. Now, we have the news by cable that there is a plan afoot, which the emperor approves, for the establishment of a new state religion in that country. It is said to have originated with Mr. Izawa, formerly of the Ministry of Education and a peer of the empire. The new organization is to be known as the "State Religious Community of Japan." One of its features is the assertion that the emperor is of divine lineage, the direct descendant of the Creator of the world. Its main purpose is to cultivate loyalty toward the emperor and the elevation of moral ideas throughout his dominions.

There is nothing specially novel in this "new religion," which would seem to be an admixture of Confucianism, or the religion of the moralities, and an extended form of ancestor-worship on a larger scale. What is significant, however, is that the old religion no longer satisfies the Japanese. With the enlargement of the nation's activities and the spread of education and Western ideas, there has come a religious crisis, which in some respects may be said to resemble that of Rome when she came to the cross-roads where she bade farewell to paganism and prepared to take up Christianity. Is Japan ready to do the same? She has clung to Buddhism, which she imported from Korea some fifteen hundred years ago, but its strength has ebbed and flowed by turns. To-day, its hold on the national heart seems to be far less strong than that of Shintoism, through which Nippon has worshiped the forces of nature, the nation's heroes and its ancestors from the time when the first emperor, Jimmu Tenno, sprang from the heart of Amaterasu O-Mi-Kami, the sun goddess, 2,600 years ago. Shintoism, notwithstanding that it has no "sacred books," no dogmas, and no code of morals, has a powerful charm for the people, rich and poor alike. Its revival now as the basis of the "new religion," could only be interpreted as springing from the desire to make the religious life of the Japanese tributary to the political power and growth of the empire. With a "divine" ruler, what would not his loyal subjects sacrifice for the glory and prestige of their country?

Christianity grows apace in Japan. It has encountered many obstacles; yet it has surmounted them all and suffered no serious defeats. It may be that this new movement, which reveals the social and spiritual unrest of the empire, will ultimately prove to be a great Gospel opportunity.

A Congress on High Prices

BALTIMORE has shown commendable civic spirit in taking a step which may greatly aid in solving the difficult problem of the high cost of living. Some time ago, an organization known as the "City-wide Congress" appointed a committee to investigate the subject and that committee has now completed its report. It finds that many causes have combined to produce the present economic conditions. First, the prime cause, which lies at the root of the whole matter, is the increased supply of gold. Among the subsidiary causes are these:

Tariff on foodstuffs and other products.
Abuse of cold storage to help corner markets.
Decreased amount of labor on farms and consequent increase in wages.
Decrease of truck farms and farming around the city.
Excessive profits of middlemen, due to too many small shops and too much handling between producer and consumer.
Too much purchase on credit at advanced prices.
Inadequate transportation to proximate farming districts, especially in winter.
Short weights and inadequate control of scales and measures.
No provision in modern houses for storage of goods.
Telephones, resulting in ordering on credit without bargaining for price.
Too high charges and improper conditions of our city markets.
Growing luxuriousness of the people, which eliminates careful, businesslike housekeeping and shopping.

To remedy these defects, as far as may be practicable, is the task to which the legislative and industrial energies of the country must now be turned. Just how this is to be accomplished the committee does not suggest, but confines itself to the proposition that a Congress be held of all the States and Territories, and including representatives of the Federal Government, looking to united action. Meanwhile, it is made more apparent than ever that communities desiring to help themselves can find the way in co-operation, and by encouraging the general opening of farmers' markets at which the products of the soil can be purchased direct from the producer by the consumer. Common sense is a wonderful solvent of most of the difficulties encountered in our everyday lives, and here it would surely apply with greater certainty and satisfaction than official remedies, which may be long delayed.

A Bitter Warning

THE American public has been horrified at the spectacle of a prominent young clergyman, the pastor of a large city church, being executed as a murderer. Clarence V. T. Richeson paid the penalty on May 20 at Boston for the crime of killing a young woman who supposed that he was engaged to marry her. Of all the distressing thoughts which crowd upon the mind in the presence of such an utter wreck of what should and might have been a useful life, none is stronger and more insistent than the regret that a successful and influential church should have been so negligent as to engage as its pastor a man who had already left behind him a trail of dishonor.

The present seems to be an occasion in which the utmost frankness of speech is not only permissible but obligatory. The whole church of Christ has suffered reproach. And it is to be earnestly hoped that out of the horror of this wretched episode there may come an added carefulness on the part of all churches, denominations and religious leaders, in allowing men to take up or continue the sacred work of preaching the Gospel. It must be remembered that eloquence and a plausible manner, and often what seems like religious fervor, cannot be trusted as proofs that the man who has all these gifts is sincere. A minister's whole career should be a matter of open history, and no church should trust its spiritual welfare and victories to any man before looking up in closest detail the facts of his character and conduct. Neglect on the part of church officials to inspect the lives of clergymen and evangelists, failure to insist that spiritual leaders be men of real spirituality and the highest honor, may result, as it has resulted here, in irremediable disaster.

General Notes

—THE ATTITUDE OF THE Roman Catholic Church toward woman suffrage has been laid down definitely and unmistakably by Father Matthew A. Taylor, priest of a leading Catholic church in New York, who dismissed Miss Aimee Hutchinson, a teacher-clerk in the parochial school of the church, because she marched in the recent woman suffrage parade. In dismissing her (according to Miss Hutchinson's own statement in the New York Times), he said: "The woman suffrage movement is the next thing to Socialism and I cannot countenance it." His course in the matter has caused a great stir in suffrage circles, the leaders of which regard Miss Hutchinson as their "first martyr" for the cause. They characterize the priest's course as carrying the religion of Rome into politics with a vengeance.

—PEACE IS ASSURED in the coal mining operations of America for the next four years. On May 17 the anthracite miners in convention at Wilkesbarre, Pa., after overcoming the opposition of the large foreign element agreed to accept the tentative arrangement proposed by the mine operators. Three days later the representatives of the mine workers and of the coal companies met in Philadelphia and ratified the agreement under which the miners gain an increase in wages and some other slight concessions. The mining of anthracite coal has been suspended for about seven weeks, yet there have been few of the developments which usually accompany a strike of this type. Slight troubles at Scranton and little clashes between the miners and the State constabulary have been the only evidences of trouble in the great Pennsylvania coal fields.

—COLONEL THEODORE ROOSEVELT has further demonstrated himself as a candidate of surprises by carrying Mr. Taft's own State, Ohio, by a sweeping majority in the presidential primaries on May 21. He may have thirty of the forty-two district delegates. Mr. Taft, however, claims seventeen delegates, and is still hopeful. The Ohio fight was hotly contested, and the result caused a revival of the rumors that Mr. Taft might retire from the contest if Ohio went against him, but this he denies positively. On learning the news, Colonel Roosevelt remarked that the fight was now over and won, but he would go on fighting till the very last. On the Democratic side Governor Harmon received strong support and will probably have twenty-six out of the forty-two delegates to the National Convention.

"Titanic's" Waifs in Mother's Arms

ONE of the most romantic mysteries of the Titanic tragedy was that of the two little waifs, aged four and two years, who were rescued from the wreck. No one knew their names, who their parents were, or whence they came. A tall, handsome and well-dressed man was devoted to them in the second cabin of the ill-fated ship, and Miss Margaret Hayes, a young woman of wealth and culture, cared for them in the lifeboat and after the survivors had been taken aboard the Carpathia. When the rescue ship reached New York, Miss Hayes took the children to the beautiful home of her father, where they were cared for. The mystery of the waifs found a place in the newspapers of two continents, and the best detective force of France undertook its solution. Now the mystery is solved. The names of the children are Michel and Edmond Navratil, of Nice, and their pet names are Lolo and Momo. Their father, with whom they were traveling to America on board the Titanic, was the proprietor of a ladies' tailoring establishment in Nice. Five years ago he married seventeen-year-old Marcelle Collata, an Italian, born in Buenos Aires, a strikingly beautiful brunette, slender and graceful, with a wealth of lustrous black hair, big brown eyes, and a complexion of peach bloom. Two lovely boys were born to them, but petty disagreements arose and a year ago they agreed to separate. The court awarded the care of the children to an uncle, who in turn gave them back to their mother. The father got possession of the boys and started with them for America under the assumed name of Hoffman. When the Titanic's lifeboats were being filled he came forward and placed his sons in one of the lifeboats, but stepped back and went down with the ship. The mother was in the meantime frantically searching Nice for her lost boys. She read in the papers of the two waifs of the disaster, but did not connect them with her own loss until she saw their pictures in print. She immediately came to America and was met by Miss Hayes and some relatives, and taken to the rooms of the Children's Society in New York, where she found the two boys, who, upon seeing her, immediately broke into sobs and rushed into her arms, crying, "Mamma! Mamma!" The mother with cries of joy swept them both into her arms and joined them in an hour of sobbing and laughing and endearment. A few days later she started back to her home in France, where she will undertake the support of the two boys on her wages as a saleswoman in one of the shops in Nice. The finding of the children and the joy it brought to the mother's heart calls to mind the words:

This my son was dead, and is alive again: he was lost, and is found. (Luke 15: 24.)

Madame Navratil and Her Boys, the Waifs of the "Titanic" Disaster

New Flameless Fire

PROFESSOR W. A. BONE, Liversay professor of coal gas and fuel industries at Leeds University, told of his discovery of a flameless heating process that will have a marked effect on the industrial and domestic heating plants of the world. After prolonged and painstaking experimentation he announces that he has installed his process of heating in a number of institutions at Leeds, and with complete success. Professor Bone's technical statement amounts briefly to this: that coal gas or vaporized oil applied to a redhot, porous solid under the new method produces an intensely glowing flameless wall of fire which gives a temperature so great that difficulty has been found to discover a material which will stand the heat. Professor Bone figures that about half the gas consumption which has hitherto been necessary to obtain a given temperature will suffice under the new process. He declares that it is the cheapest method of producing steam which has yet been devised. Among the purposes to which the discovery may be applied is cooking, in which a porous diaphragm can be used; heating in furnaces, the raising of steam in multitubular boilers, and the melting of metals, as for instance, newspaper type. As Professor Bone is one of the best known and highly respected authorities on the subject in the world, it is likely that his recent discovery will receive the most careful attention. The new process may be in the interest of industrial economy, but it will knock the poetry out of fire with the beautiful flames of blue, red, yellow, purple and white, to which the Psalmist refers:

While I was musing the fire burned. (Ps. 39: 3.)

Passing of Historic Warship

WHEN the torch was applied to tar barrels stacked against the old wooden warship Pensacola in San Francisco the other day, there went up in smoke a vessel of historic value, one that was an active participant in the Civil War. It survived the fire of the batteries at New Orleans and Mobile Bay, and carried the flag of Captain George Dewey in the Mediterranean. After having served for many years as training ship at the local naval receiving station, the vessel that cost $500,000 to build and $1,500,000 to repair was sold for $10,000, being valuable only for the copper bolts used in her construction. Forms wear out and are thrown away, forces remain. The decayed form of the ship was destroyed, but the principles for which it stood remain. There is no torch hot enough to burn up the loyalty and courage and destiny incarnated in the old-fashioned ship of war. It is to be hoped that a righteous public sentiment may so continue to grow that the destruction of the old wooden warship may typify the passing of the costly and cruel armaments of the sea and land and the establishment of a universal peace upon the basis of Christ's love in fulfilment of the prophecy:

Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. (Isa. 2: 4.)

Base Ball Gambling

IT HAS been the intention of those in charge of the baseball contests in this country that the game shall be clean, straight, wholesome, free from the vices that have associated themselves with some other forms of sport. And it has generally been conceded that gambling and some other forms of demoralization had been absent from the game. It was generally understood that some polite "gentlemanly" gambling had been going on, but in an unobtrusive manner. Morally the "gentlemanly" betting was as bad as the pools of the bookmakers at the race tracks. But now it seems that in many places base ball has been transformed into a gambling game by the institution of pools, tickets for which are sold in saloons, cigar stores and by itinerant pedlers. The tickets sell all the way from twenty-five cents to five dollars. This is an outrage on all decency, demoralizing in the extreme to young men and older ones. It is in defiance of law, and the pool sellers should be fined and imprisoned. It will be well for the managers to put an end to this gambling, as the continuance of this debauchery would kill baseball as a national game in another year. Dishonesty is as unwise in policy as it is bad in principle.

Thou shalt not steal. (Ex. 20: 15.)

Seven Tons of Bibles Shipped

ABOUT the middle of May the American Bible Society made a shipment from its headquarters at the Bible House, New York City, which is listed among its records for a single day's sending out of the Scriptures. Over seven tons of Bibles were shipped at that time. Thirty-one cases were in the form of unbound sheets, printed in the Zulu language. These were shipped to London, England, where they will be bound and sent on to South Africa for distribution. The remainder of the shipment was destined for Colombia and Brazil. These Bibles were complete in every way and were printed in Spanish and Portuguese. The Society is preparing for work among the sailors who will pass through the Panama Canal. It is already represented in Panama, but will enlarge its work as soon as the canal opens. Through the canal it also plans to do larger Bible work on the west coast of South America. This dissemination of the Scriptures to men of every race and every tongue calls to mind the admonition of the prophet:

Hear the word of the Lord, O ye nations. (Jer. 31:10.)

Prizes for Child Gardening

AS a result of a State-wide industrial contest in Oregon there are now 50,000 children busy gardening. It is thought that of the 125,000 school children of the State at least 75,000 will exhibit at their county fairs or at the State fair at Salem in the autumn something they have raised or made. Substantial prizes are to be awarded to those who have been most successful in raising garden stuff, chickens and pigs, or in making some useful article. The scheme is an excellent one, so different from the murderous child labor of the factory. It includes fresh air, healthful exercise, and that blessed contact with nature, her beauty and life. There is here the early lesson of obedience to the royal law of labor.

Study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you. (I. Thes. 4: 11.)

The Dead Newsboy

THOMAS VERDON, a bright little newsboy, as honest as the day is long, was known on the East Side of New York from Fourteenth to Forty-second Street as "The Little Philanthropist," so large was his heart and so many were his favors to others. He died in Bellevue Hospital the other day, and the principal support of his mother and small brother was taken away. Tommy's father was a street-cleaner before the strike, and had been unable to get work since. His mother, who undertook the support of the family by washing, collapsed and had to give up work. It was Tommy's pennies that furnished food and shelter for the family. Harry Engel and other companions among the newsboys went around trying to collect enough to give Tommy a decent funeral. They circulated the following slip: "Please help Tommy Verdon, the newsboy, who is dead. Anything that will help bury him will be appreciated. (Signed) THE NEWSBOYS." How much of the tragedy of life is here! Industry, enterprise, tact, honesty, the support of a family by a boy in his teens, death and the sorrow and loyal love of companions. How much of the story of life is wrapped up in that of the little newsboy! The desire of the newsboys to give Tommy a respectable burial was as beautiful as that bestowed upon the dead king in the royal sepulcher.

And they laid him in the bed which was filled with sweet odors and divers kind of spices prepared by the apothecary's art. (II. Chron. 16: 14.)

THE SPIRIT OF WAR

From a painting by Franz Von Stuck

WAR, with its attendant horrors, has been the theme of a number of world-famous paintings by celebrated artists. We have seen the pomp and glory of the battlefield depicted side by side with the mangled, wounded and dying. Hardly a great battle in the world's history has not been reproduced by some realistic master hand on the painted canvas. The great galleries of Europe are filled with such representations.

Nearly all the capitals, ancient and modern, have been scenes of battle and carnage. None may number the victims of the great wars of Greece and Rome, of the siege of Carthage, the Persian wars, the Scythian, Tartar and Germanic wars, the battlefields of Assyria, Babylonia and Egypt, of the wars of Titus and the later conquests of Timur, Charlemagne, Cæsar and Napoleon. Roughly estimated, they would almost equal one-quarter of the present population of the globe!

The great picture of Franz Von Stuck, given above, which illustrates the horror and pathos of war, must be ranked with that other famous canvas, "The Conquerors," in which the great military leaders of the world from the beginning of time are seen advancing on horseback through a field of serried dead. Cæsar, Alexander, Napoleon lead in this ghastly cavalcade. On either side to the horizon's edge lie the unnumbered victims of militarism—the wretched creatures who have been counted as mere pawns in the "great game of kings." Von Stuck's picture shows the Spirit of Battle, stark, brutal, unfeeling. With uplifted sword he rides over the dead and dying, his merciless face not even deigning to turn toward his victims. Brute strength and cruelty are marked in frame and visage; pride and callous indifference to human suffering can be read in his mien. This is the type of him who conquers by sheer strength.

In these days, when the peace movement has made such hopeful progress, it is well for every one to study this thought-compelling picture. There are to-day rulers and generals, premiers and statesmen, and unfortunately a host of other misguided mortals, who still believe in war. They do not seem to comprehend that there is no human difficulty that can arise between governments, nations and communities, which is incapable of adjustment by any other means than by sword or cannon. On the other hand, however, there is in every civilized country a growing hope that the time is coming when wars will cease and when all difficulties will be adjusted by peaceful arbitration, according to the principles of law and equity. The establishment of the Hague Tribunal was a great step toward this end. Arbitration treaties have been concluded between different countries, which still further guarantee the avoidance of war in the future. Over thirty nations are signatories to an international agreement favoring arbitration; but how lightly they hold such a pledge may be gathered from the fact that as we write wars are raging between Turkey and Italy, France and Morocco and in Mexico. Nearly all the great powers are like armed camps, prepared for sudden warlike emergencies. Never has the world's armament, military and naval, been so large or so costly as now. The annual budget of the leading nations, our own country included, for the maintenance of fighting forces, is: Armies, $1,241,853,000; navies, $692,369,000.

At the conference held recently at Mohonk, N. Y., important addresses were delivered showing the frightful cost of militarism to-day and the oppressive burden it imposes upon the industries of the world. Some of the nations that have the largest armaments strongly favor peace as far as the popular desire is concerned; but each is jealous of the other's fighting strength.

Von Stuck's Demon of Battle is not an anachronism; he is riding on the dead even to-day, and he will continue to ride until that time when, in God's good providence, men shall lay aside forever the weapons of war and the swords shall be turned into plowshares and the spears into pruning-hooks.

SCOTTY DECIDES

BY MAY BELLEVILLE BROWN

SCOTTY swept his tail back and forth on the floor and looked inquiringly from one to the other. Although age had dulled his sight and hearing, he knew that the discussion in some ay concerned him, but he kept silent, as a well-bred ollie should, and only moved his tail occasionally, to ow the intelligent interest he felt in the discussion.

However, when Miss Martha's voice faltered and er lips trembled, he got up, and, walking to her ide, dropped his nose on her twitching hands. He anted her to know that he sided with her.

"You see, it's this way"—her brother's voice was ritable, but only with the nature of his errand—we haven't any too much ground, nyway, and the children keep pets. he twins have their white rabbits, addon his fox terrier, Walter his ony, Patty her kittens, and Old hep belongs to all of us; so there eally doesn't seem to be any room or a dog as big as Scotty. Of ourse, I wouldn't suggest it if he asn't so old, but he won't live much onger, and there are ways of doing painlessly—er—you know."

Miss Martha Alderson rose to her eet, Scotty standing at attention eside her.

"That will do, James!" Her voice hrilled with the indignation of age. I would as soon talk of chloroforming you. Scotty has lived with me wenty years, and shall live out his llotted time. A dog would never etray one whom he loved"—her accent of scorn was ineffable—"and I an at least be as trustworthy. When father died, he staid by mother nd me for days, and when she was aken, I don't think I could have orne it but for his head in my lap—rith your family all in Europe, and ne alone here."

"But you can't live here much onger," argued her brother. "This roperty has been condemned for ublic uses, and the new high school hat is to be built here must be done y fall. You'd better put your money n interest, and have the use of it, ather than buy somewhere else. And you ought not to live alone, anyway."

"That will do, James!" Miss Martha repeated with infinite dignity. "I hall not have to live alone while have Scotty; and, in any event, I hall never live with you after today's interview."

Mr. Alderson grew red and floundered in his speech, but still argued. He really wanted his sister to live with him, and his suggestion that Scotty be disposed of had been his own thought and meant harmlessly enough. When he saw his sister's ndignation, he dropped the idea at nce, and begged her to come on any erms, but she was stubborn, and finally intimated that she wished to end the interview.

So a flushed, flurried and well-meaning man strode away, leaving Miss Martha on her front stoop with Scotty beside her. The dog wagged his tail intermittently as he watched Mr. Alderson's retreating form. He knew Miss Martha was troubled, and his sympathy was with her; but Mr. Alderson represented to his dogship the most interesting combination possible—a house full of children and a yard full of pets. His visits there had been episodes of adventure.

Through the days that followed, Scotty's loyalty was tried. First had come Mrs. Alderson, anxious to undo the harm her well-meaning husband had done.

"Of course we can make room for Scotty," she assured her sister-in-law. "I can't think why James suggested such a thing."

"Thank you, Mary," returned Miss Martha, so coldly that Scotty retreated from the visitor's side, to sit by his mistress; "you are kind to offer me a home, but Scotty and I will stay together. I couldn't live where such an idea had been entertained. I should feel that if anything happened to me, he wouldn't be safe for a minute. I shall arrange for strangers to take him when I am gone."

Haddon, the oldest boy, came next, and of the whole family Scotty worshiped Haddon, who knew just the right inflection of friendliness to put into his tone, and just the place where a dog likes his ear rubbed.

Haddon did not even get to the door, but stood bareheaded on the walk, while Aunt Martha held the top step, looking, in her ancient black silk, and with her fingers lightly touching Scotty's head, like an old family portrait.

Scotty could not help whining just a bit as the lad walked away rebuffed; then he contritely buried his soft black muzzle in Miss Martha's hand.

Then there was Patty to come—Patty, with her solemn black eyes and her heart full of compassion for every living creature; Walter, freckled and merry, and, last of all, the roly-poly twins, so inseparable that The Twins was the only name either knew. But, like the peacemakers who preceded them, they were turned from the door. Miss Martha's heart was cold within her breast. Personal slights she might have stood; but Scotty, the companion of twenty lonely years, had been threatened, and she could not forgive. The Alderson family dropped the matter temporarily, hoping that when the final move came, their relative would accept apologies and come to them.

Miss Martha, left alone, went about her little household tasks with Scotty clinging to her steps. The dog apparently felt her uneasiness, and the impending cataclysm; for the date was drawing perilously near when the authorities were to claim her home. Into her frugal, narrow old life was coming a great change, and by her own decree she must meet it with only Scotty to help.

"James was right, I'm afraid, Scotty," she told him in one of their twilight conferences. "We're both too old to live alone, and if I buy another home with the money I get for this, what we have left won't pay for some one to stay and take care of us. Of course, James has been liberal with us—letting us keep all that father left, and always wanting to give us more. I'm glad now that I never took any of his money," she added, her lips setting in a straight line.

Scotty, making inarticulate noises in his throat, gave her his paw, as though in recognition of her loyalty to him. The two sat long together that evening, Miss Martha talking in snatches, Scotty responding, dogwise. Finally a decision was reached.

"I'll leave you here to-morrow, and go over to Benton to the Old Ladies' Home," she told Scotty. "If they will let me take you, I'll have enough to pay my entrance fee; and the rest, put on interest, will buy any extras we need. I can take the trolley in the morning and be back in the middle of the afternoon."

The interurban line was new to their Western city, and especially so to Miss Martha, who had never ventured alone upon a trolley car. The bell rang noisily, as the car rocked and plunged along the country lanes, or stopped so precipitately that she was almost thrown from the seat. There was a change at a cross-roads hamlet, and then a noisier, rougher, longer ride into Benton, so that it was a much shaken and bewildered Miss Martha who at last found herself ringing the door bell at the Home.

The superintendent was affable; then, when Miss Martha mentioned her resources, she absolutely beamed.

There need be no delay in arrangements; Miss Alderson would be welcome; she was to be congratulated upon having more income than so many who came there; she would be able to provide herself with many more comforts than most of the inmates—

Just here Miss Martha timidly introduced the subject of Scotty. The superintendent's flow of language was checked; beaming ceased; affability stiffened.

She was sorry, but the rules of the Home prohibited pets of any kind, and they could make no exceptions. Did Miss Alderson say that the collie was old? Then she would advise chloroforming him. There are people who do those things quite painlessly, and it is really merciful.

Miss Martha's indignation carried her quite to the station, and also caused her to forget the cup of tea which she had promised herself at Benton. Bewildered and numb she sat in the rocking car and thought of herself and Scotty—two old derelicts. Why didn't they chloroform old people, too?

The car stopped at a little cluster of houses. Miss Martha descended, and it was not until she had boarded the other car and started to pay her fare that she learned that she had changed cars too soon, and was going in the wrong direction. The conductor let her off, and showed her a cross path to the corners where she should have changed.

"Go through two fields, and that patch of woods yonder, turn to your left when you strike the road," he told her. "It ain't much more than a mile, and you can't miss it."

Shortly before nine o'clock that night Haddon Alderson ran breathlessly up the steps of his home and called his father.

"Something has happened at Aunt Martha's," he announced. "Scotty is shut up in the house barking like mad, and there is no light. I'll get a lantern and come with you."

He was back with the lantern almost as soon as his father had found his hat and coat, and the pair dashed out of doors. For more than a block down the street they heard the short, high-keyed bark of an excited collie, rapid and ceaseless, and growing in excitement as they neared the house. The door would not yield, and Mr. Alderson was forced to shatter a window pane. Raising the sash, he stepped inside, followed by Haddon. Quickly as they cleared the window space, Scotty jumped through and vanished. A hurried search showed them that Miss Martha was not there.

"Let's catch up with him before he picks up her trail and is out of sight," Mr. Alderson said to Haddon.

But Scotty had trouble picking up a trail. He circled the rosebushes in the yard, and stood at the gate a moment with his sensitive nostrils aquiver. Then a trolley car clanged, and he remembered. Down the street beside the track he started at an easy gait, and the two followed him—out of town and far into the country.

Just how long they tracked him through the dim moonlight they never knew, but it seemed miles that he wound in and out, over fences and through thickets, until they thought he had scoured every inch of the countryside.

The old Scotty, dim of sight and dull of hearing, was gone, and in his place was a vigorous young animal, keen-scented as a hound. It was not a trail that he followed, however, but the leading of an instinctive love more powerful than scent and sight and hearing. Finally he stopped on a little hillock and stood with his pointed ears pricked.

"We were wrong to follow a foolish old creature like this," Mr. Alderson was saying. "We should have waited to make inquiries. I thought he might trail her, but there has been nothing to bring her out this way." Just then Scotty raised his head and started down hill.

"Well, come on," concluded Mr. Alderson. "Let's catch up with him and take him back to town with us. We'll see what we can learn there."

This time Scotty went at such a pace that they lost him. Even the sound of his feet through the bushes died away. Then, from far down the little valley, where the trees were thickest, came the alarm—the quick, high-keyed bark of a collie.

"We'll probably find that he's treed a squirrel," grumbled Mr. Alderson, but he redoubled his speed. They crashed through the bushes, sprang over a little creek and up the opposite bank. There, but a few rods from the roadside, they found Scotty hanging over Miss Martha, who was only half-conscious of his warm tongue on her cold face and hands.

"Scotty," she murmured, unsurprised, "I knew you'd come for me. It's only us two, now."

It was a bright, sunshiny spring morning when Miss Martha found herself wide awake. She knew where she was—in Mary Alderson's sunny guest chamber, with the yellow poppies on the walls and hangings.

She looked at her brother and his wife, and into Patty's big eyes, that were wells of love and pity. Now was the time for explanations, but Miss Martha was of few words. This time, one sufficed. It was a question and a warning.

"Scotty!"

Mr. Alderson smiled firmly and reassuringly.

"Scotty, my dear Martha, after having been Shep's honored guest for the night, has been elected president, crown prince, ambassador plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to the front lawn, the back yard, the stable, the rabbit hutch, not to mention the house of Alderson. He has talked with the Shetland pony, nosed the white rabbits, wrestled with the fox terrier, and let the kittens play with his tail. He is where he belongs, and he is going to stay here, no matter what you decide to do."

Here the door was pushed open and Scotty entered, his eyes soft and bright, his plumy tail waving expressively, and his bearing one of great responsibility. Stepping lightly, he walked to Miss Martha's side and deposited on the bed beside her one small, damp, ruffled, but unharmed Maltese kitten; then burrowed his slender nose in her palm. As nearly as a collie could, he was telling her that he had found his own, and inviting her to share it with him.

Miss Martha looked into the dog's eager eyes, and her remark closed the matter and adjusted the Alderson family affairs for all time.

"I wish I had let Scotty decide in the first place."

Artificial vs. the Genuine Article

ONE of the most interesting industries developed in the past ten years is the manufacture of leather. The methods and means of producing it have recently been so perfected as to furnish the markets to-day with an article which in many ways has great advantages over genuine leather. In the first place it is cheaper, less perishable and more elastic; given even a moderate amount of care it will neither crack nor pucker; grease or water will not mar it and when articles made of the artificial material are soiled, simple sponging with warm soapsuds will make them as good as new.

An Up-to-Date Kerchief Recticule

No longer are the uses of manufactured leather confined to automobile and buggy tops, to the upholstering of furniture or as a substitute for wall panels and papering. There is scarcely a room in the house in which it may not be used with artistic effect. And the household sewing machine will carry it as easily as it does cotton cloth. Portières trimmed with bands of this new and inexpensive fabric in soft shades of brown, old rose or delft blue are effective and rich looking. Sofa pillows made of two shades of artificial leather appliquéd in some bold design one upon the other are not only handsome and satisfactory but are extremely stylish as well.

In my lady's boudoir its uses are manifold. None of the kerchief reticules now so fashionable are prettier or more durable than those made up in delicate shades of leather. The bag pictured in this article is of soft sage green lined with cream satin. The braid and pendants are of dull gold. It is home-made and comfortably within the possibilities of short purses.

For the friend who is a June bride a white leather bag lined with white satin, braided with white silk, ornamented with soft silk tassels and hanging upon a white stitched belt is a matchless gift and can be made at home with all ease.

Music carriers of brown baby alligator lined with plain leather of a lighter shade can also be readily made by hand and are fully as attractive looking as the expensive alligator "carriers" sold by leather dealers. Moccasins and bootees, bibs, leggings, Tam o' Shanters, scrap baskets and table tops, bureau boxes, collar and shirtwaist boxes, chair cushions and hassocks, in fact, there seems no limit to the practical and artistic household articles which almost any one can make out of various grades and shades of artificial leather.

The Howard Watch

SIX hundred thousand Americans go abroad every year.

Once the American tourist preferred a foreign watch. Now he goes to Europe with a HOWARD bought here—or comes back with a HOWARD bought there.

He has an example in the ship's officer on the dock, who orders up the gang plank on HOWARD time.

You find more and more of the responsible men carrying HOWARD Watches.

The great railroads started it. The time inspectors of 180 American railroads have officially certified and adopted the HOWARD.

It is carried by leading technical men—by the heads of great industrial and commercial enterprises—by scientists—by army and navy officers and government officials.

Many a man buys a HOWARD for the sheer pleasure of owning the watch that is so well spoken of by men whose opinion he respects.

A HOWARD Watch is always worth what you pay for it.

The price of each watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Crescent Extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40, to the 23-jewel at $150—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know.

Admiral Sigsbee has written a little book, "The Log of the HOWARD Watch," giving the record of his own HOWARD in the U. S. Navy. You'll enjoy it. Drop us a post-card, Dept. W, and we'll send you a copy.

This Water Sealed Heat-Tight Top Makes Fireless Cooking Perfect

UNTIL we invented the "Water Sealed" Top of the "Ideal" Fireless Cooker a perfect Fireless Cooker did not exist. You have only one question to consider in choosing a Fireless Cooker—which one best retains the heat? Right out of the top—the hottest part—the heat streams away from the ordinary Fireless Cooker—and it's that precious heat, which is the one thing needful.

Imprisoned heat is what does the cooking in a Fireless Cooker. When you examine your "Ideal" Fireless Cooker, you will see that loss of heat simply cannot take place through its "Water Sealed" Top. This means that the "Ideal" Fireless Cooker Cooks Faster, Cooks Better and Keeps the Food Hot Longer than any other Fireless Cooker. It will Roast, Bake, Steam, Stew and Boil, and saves 80% of the fuel and reduces work and worry to a minimum.

"Ideal" Fireless Cook Stoves are Lined With "Pure" Aluminum

You want a Cooker lined with a metal which will not rust, pinhole, corrode, chip or crack. "PURE" Aluminum is the only insurance against these things. Separate cover over each compartment. Equipment of "WEAR EVER" Aluminum Utensils.

Try the "IDEAL" at our risk. Use the COOKER 30 days and if it is not all we claim, money refunded. You can pay for an "IDEAL" Fireless Cooker a little each month if you desire. Write today for illustrated catalogue and details of our easy payment plan.

HOME CHATS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Concerning Our Thoughts

WE PLACE a good deal of emphasis on what we say and what we do, but it seldom occurs to us to make such account of what we think. The habitual process of thought goes on within us during the day, and at times it invades the quiet hours of the night. When we dream, a portion of the brain is wakeful, and whether our dreams are pleasant or the reverse, they may be traced along a byath of the mind and are a revelation of our manner of thought. What do we think about? In hours when we are silent the brain is not altogether inactive, and it is sending forth its train from the station sometimes with the slowness of freight cars and sometimes with the speed of a flying express. Have we good thoughts, kind thoughts and uplifting thoughts, or are our thoughts unkind, malicious, uncharitable, skeptical or possibly profane? Whence do our thoughts come to us? They seem to be borne in from an invisible and supernatural world. Again, they are obviously prompted by our immediate environment. Still again, our thoughts are apparently the product of a laboratory that is located within ourselves. Are we at pains to control our thoughts? For example, when we are in church is our thought concentrated on the act of worship, on the prayers and the sermon and the song, or do we permit it to wander to the ends of the earth? Who is not aware of the familiar expression, "absence of mind"? We have known what it is to lose fragments of conversation around us, and have been compelled to call a halt as to something of which we have been thinking and beg pardon for inattention, while we have asked a friend to repeat what has already been said.

We may gain mental discipline by resolutely fixing the mind upon a subject and insisting on quiet thought along a definite line. The woman at home may as easily acquire a habit of controlled thought as she goes about her daily work as the editor at his desk and the minister in his study. Idle people have more trouble in positive and profound attention in the spiritual realm than appears to be the experience of those who are busy. The busy man and the busy woman cannot lose time and strength by wilful waste of thought. Even children may learn to halt still and think. Most of us would be the gainers by making it our rule never to write a letter, make a promise or plunge into hasty speech without being sure that the right start has been given in the region of thought.

Our Little Brothers of the Air

THE birds are very busy in the early summer. Those who know them and who have the pleasure of living where there are a number of varieties are greatly entertained by watching the beautiful-winged creatures as they flit from branch to branch. Father-bird and mother-bird take a care of their fledglings not very dissimilar from that given to babies by the parents of our race. To protect the birds is to add a joy to life and to insure our orchards and crops from the devastation of insect foes.

Grandmother's Garden

IN GRANDMOTHER'S garden there were old-fashioned posies. Four o'clocks, lady-slippers, love-lies-bleeding, verbenas, mignonette and clove-pinks crowded one another in her garden borders. She had peonies and box, lilies of the valley, pansies and roses. How sweet was the white rose that bloomed beside her porch; how her morning glories opened to the sun, and how fragrant was the breath of the honeysuckle in the twilights of June! Grandmother's garden was not laid out by a landscape artist. It expressed something of her sturdy courage, her dauntless perseverance and her overflowing affection. She spent hours working among her plants, and they rewarded her with lavish bloom and a fragrance that lingers in perpetual perfume now that she walks in the gardens of God.

The Strenuous Life

WE HEAR a great deal about the simple life, and undoubtedly much may be said in its favor. The simple lives of our grandmothers which we hear so much about were far less easy than our own. In the realm of the household we have many things ready to our hand that in their day were prepared by their own labor. In lighting and heating, in cooking and laundry work the housewife of a former day was not assisted as she is now by modern conveniences. The farmer's home had few luxuries, although comfort was not lacking. The spinning wheel regarded to-day as an ornament, and proudly displayed as an heirloom, was once a necessary adjunct in home economy. We have every advantage over our predecessors in the line of economy and in the line, too, of simplicity. Let a word be said, therefore, in behalf of the strenuous life. We women should earnestly try to make our lives tell, first, for good in the home, next, for the elevation of the community, and as the coronation of all, for the upbuilding of the church. We cannot lead the spiritual life without being in a measure strenuous. The refrain of a familiar hymn, "Take time to be holy," is not the mere dream of a poet. To read one's Bible thoughtfully every day requires time. To drop outside cares and retreat from the atmosphere of the world around one and thus secure silence and solitude for a little space morning by morning requires time. Whoever would grow in spirituality must be strenuous, and whoever would achieve results worth having in any direction must be willing to accept a certain amount of drudgery and do without a certain amount of leisure.

Children's Day

MAY brought us Mother's Day. June brings us Children's Day. On the second Sunday of June the morning service in most of our churches is devoted to the children. The floor space of the auditorium is set apart for them, and pew-holders observe from the galleries the brilliant array of banners and the beautiful picture of child-life displayed when the Sunday school is massed before the pulpit.

The children sing and the minister preaches to them. The dominant feeling of the spectator is thankfulness at the advance of the new generation. How exquisite is childhood! How radiant are these youthful faces! Gazing at them we comprehend what the Master meant when he said, "Except ye become as little children ye cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven." God bless our children. Jesus Christ was once a child. There is no child in our Sunday school whose birthdays do not number precisely those of our Lord at some point of his human career. Jesus loves the little children. He has said, "Suffer them to come unto me, and forbid them not." We rejoice that June and the children meet in the sanctuary once a year. Why not let every Sunday see our children in the pew? Why not let them always have a share in the preliminary service, a hymn of their own and a little word from the pastor?

"I must have this"

When my wife wants to "show me off" to distinguished company, she serves beefsteak and asks me to make my famous Snider beefsteak sauce.

It must be made at the table and the principal ingredient is

SNIDER'S Tomato CATSUP

There is nothing quite equal to Snider's. Every tomato is a "thoroughbred," grown on pedigreed vines, plucked just at the "red-to-the-stem" instant and "done" into Catsup the very same day.

The seasonings, too, and all materials are of the very choicest, while the recipe, known only to Snider, is a famous old home rule no longer found in books.

Snider factories are spotless, and no expense is spared to make and keep Snider's Catsup the finest relish ever put on the market.

Here is the genuine recipe for serving.

SNIDER BEEFSTEAK SAUCE

2 tablespoonsful of Snider's Tomato Catsup.
½ teaspoonful of German Imported Mustard.
Mix well, cut steak in slices, placing a piece of butter between each slice. Spread sauce over steak and serve at once.

Snider Process Pork and Beans have a flavor peculiarly delicious, due to the special Snider way of cooking and to the sauce, made from Snider's Catsup.

Snider's are good any time, anywhere. Buy them by the case.

Snider's Chill Sauce may be used in place of catsup, in the above recipe for Snider Beefsteak. Use it on cold meats and fish.

The British "Titanic" Inquiry

THE proceedings of the London Court of Inquiry in regard to the sinking of the Titanic have been long drawn out, and though the investigation was carried on by the authorities in the most painstaking way and witnesses examined with the utmost care, little, if anything, has been added to the public knowledge of the great sea tragedy secured by the senatorial investigation at Washington. Beyond a few minor details that can have little bearing one way or the other, the tragic story remains the same, a story which despite its sadness reveals the dignity of manhood and the courage of which it is capable in face of danger and death.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of the London inquiry was the examination of Sir Cosmo and Lady Duff-Gordon, who made good their escape in a lifeboat which, it was shown, could have accommodated three times the number. It was testified that Sir Cosmo had given each member of the lifeboat crew a five-pound note ($25). When asked to explain he replied that one of the sailors had told him all had lost their kits in the wreck, whereupon he promised each a "fiver" for a new kit. But the most serious charge against the baronet was his having objected to the lifeboat putting back for any who might be struggling in the waters. Hendrickson, a fireman, one of the lifeboat crew, testified to this as he did also to the bonus of $25. Others denied this testimony. Sir Cosmo defended himself as best he could and seemed to have had as hard a struggle for his honor as he had had for his life. He denied that there was room for more in the boat without throwing out mast and oars, and he denied also that he forbade the crew to go back to the aid of others. Lady Duff-Gordon was also subjected to a severe cross-examination.

The conduct of J. Bruce Ismay, of course, came into evidence at the London inquiry. It was described as having been exemplary. James Johnson, a steward, testified that "Ismay did everything an Englishman could do under the circumstances."

The most important fact brought out at the inquiry was the proximity of the Leyland liner Californian to the sinking vessel. At least one officer of the Californian firmly believes that they were in the vicinity of the Titanic the night she went down, and although he did not know at the time he actually saw her sinking as the lights of the vessel they were watching disappeared. Gibson, one of the men of the Leyland liner, told of seeing the lights and rockets of a vessel and of trying to signal her by means of the Morse code, and having reported the matter to the captain. He said the vessel was lying near by, but he could not see her outlines, but only the glare of her lights. There can be but little doubt that the vessel was the unfortunate Titanic.

M. N., Mayetta, Kan. 1. What became of the famous little Monitor? 2. Did she ever have any other engagements besides the one with the Merrimac? 3. Was the Monitor the only one of her kind, or were other similar vessels built?

1. The Monitor sank off Cape Hatteras on ecember 29, 1862. Some of her officers and en were rescued by vessels accompanying her, it sixteen went down with her. 2. In the few onths intervening between her brilliant enunter with the Merrimac on March 9, and her s in December, she was in no active engageent except to assist in an unsuccessful attempt capture Richmond. 3. The Danish Governent built a turret ship, the Rolf Krake, about e time of the Monitor's construction. But ericsson was the first to produce a vessel with revolving turret. Other vessels were built, tterned largely after the Monitor, and the pe is still in use. While Ericsson was the gineer who built the Monitor, the real credit r inventing the revolving turret is given to heodore Ruggles Timby, of Dover, N. . N. H., Bloomingdale, Ind. 1. About how many Mohammedans are in the United States? 2. Is their religion spreading? 3. Have they mosques in America? 4. Have they religious publications? 5. Are Mohammedan missionaries being sent out from New York to stations in our own country and to foreign lands?

1. No statistics have been compiled, but there re probably over one hundred thousand. 2. es, especially in African and Asiatic countries nd in some islands of Polynesia. 3. No. 4. es, there are a few Mohammedan papers in te larger cities. 5. The Mohammedans are uch given to proselytizing; missionaries of heir faith have gone in numbers from New ork to the Philippines, and it is safe to asume they are at work elsewhere.

. C. A., Boston. 1. Why does the cold get stronger as the days get longer? 2. Why is April 21 not as hot as August 21, seeing that both are about equally distant from June 21, the longest day?

1. Heat and cold depend upon the sun's rays. n winter in the northern hemisphere, they rike the earth more obliquely than in summer, ence the cold. December 21 is our winter olstice and the rays of the sun then strike our titude at a minimum angle, hence the cold ould be greatest, but is not until it accumuates, owing to the length of the nights and he state of the earth and atmosphere. It eaches a maximum about February, when it is radually driven away by the increasing force f the sun's rays striking more directly as he ounts higher in the heavens. 2. On April 21 he sun is coming back from the southern solice and his rays have to break up the cold that as accumulated. On June 21 he reaches his highest meridian altitude with us, when his rays trike at their greatest angle, though this is not ur hottest day. For some time afterwards the eat, like the cold in the other case, accumulates, ntil about August it is at a maximum and beins to decrease as the sun recedes. The apparent limits of the sun in the heavens are raced on the earth by the Tropic of Cancer nd the Tropic of Capricorn. Between these mits he is always shining perpendicularly on ome part of the earth.

s there any part of the globe where there is six months day and six months night?

Yes, at the Poles.

Subscriber, Concordia, Ky. Is it right or wrong to deal in business through a board of trade? Is it gambling or speculation?

A board of trade is an association of busiess men, organized to promote business interests and to make rules for conducting trade on ound and honest principles. Rightly manged, therefore, it is an admirable institution; ut if it lends itself to speculation and enourages "wildcat" investments, it is the reverse. There is a point where the line should e drawn against illegitimate risks, usury, and ambling ventures.

Mrs. F. S., Haskins, O. Please explain John 14 and also Mark 11: 22.

John 14 is one of the most sacred chapters n the Gospels, being a record of the last moments passed by Jesus among his disciples before the great crisis. Love filled his heart and lowed from his lips. His language assumed even a loftier strain than usual. In his intersory prayer, he poured out his soul in behalf of those who were already his own. To the disciples, it was a discourse both of cheer and orrow. He seemed to open heaven's gates, to give them a glimpse of the heavenly home, the "house of many mansions" that awaited them, and whither he was now going. More than ever before he expressed with clearness and simplicity his close and loving relations to them. He strengthened their faith, promised them an enduement of spiritual power and the coming of the Comforter to be their guide and adviser. In dignity, significance and supreme affection, it was a parting address whose equal never fell from human lips. The passage in Mark 11: 22 is illustrated in the verse which follows, the Saviour's design being to teach the great lesson that no obstacle should stand before a firm faith in God. Although the illustration was a physical test, it is clear from verse 24 that moral obstacles rather than physical were meant. All three verses combined give special encouragement to spiritual effort and confidence in prevailing prayer.

M. A. A., Chatham, N. Y. In The Christian Herald Almanac is an article in which Dr. Talmage tells how congregational singing may be stopped. He shows how some churches discourage it. The church of which I am a member for the present has no choir and we have congregational singing instead.

There are comparatively few churches without a choir or a quartet nowadays; yet we can conceive how a choirless church may get along very well with some one at the organ who can act as leader. It is customary to play over a verse of the hymn before beginning to sing, and although the absence of a choir would undoubtedly be felt, its assistance in the singing is not indispensable. Sacred song by the congregation is an important part of worship and should never be discouraged.

W. T. M., Paducah, Ky. What book outside the Bible has been instrumental in bringing the greatest number of people to Christ, and where can it be secured?

Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress and Thomas a Kempis's Imitation of Christ have been considered the most widely read and helpful religious books outside the Bible. Yet each of these books, particularly the latter, has probably been useful in training Christians in the spiritual life rather than in winning the unconverted. It would be impossible to mention any one book which could be known to have led more souls to Christ than any other. If the book could be found it would probably be a collection of sermons by some great preacher or evangelist, such as Spurgeon or Moody. One of the most helpful books to bring to the attention of the unconverted is Spurgeon's All of Grace.

A. B. M., Decatur, Ia. What is the present Christian population of India?

According to the statistics of 1911, there were in India 3,876,203 Christians by profession, an increase of 33 per cent. over the figures of 1901. The largest increase was in eastern Bengal and Assam, 176 per cent., and the smallest in Bombay, 12 per cent.

W. S., Ellensburg, Wash. A Bible class teacher is saying that the Old Testament, the four Gospels and all non-Pauline epistles have no message for us and are often contradictory to the Pauline epistles, which contain all that is essential to salvation. What is THE MAIL-BAG's opinion of this?

If you have not misunderstood this teacher, his remarks have been unwise and unsafe. It is quite proper to lay special emphasis upon the writings of Paul, because he was especially chosen of God to interpret the life and death of the Saviour to the hearts and minds of men, particularly of those who were not Jews. Furthermore, Paul was authorized to show that the requirements of the ceremonial law, as recorded by Moses, were done away with by the sacrifice of Christ. In this way it is easy to see that the explanation of the salvation wrought by the atonement is of more spiritual value than the precepts of the old law of sacrifices and ceremonies, which are no longer in force. The tremendous value of Paul's writings lies in the fact that he shows men the practical, immediate way of receiving salvation, not by the keeping of commandments, but by faith in the crucified Saviour. Granting all this, however, it is great folly to say that the other parts of the Bible are unimportant. The Pentateuch is full of flashes of God's presence and God's will, containing holy principles which are eternal, and recording the experiences of men who knew God; the historical books show God working in the life of a nation; the poetical and wisdom books give us inspiration and instruction for daily living; the prophetic books give us glimpses of the coming Saviour and are pulsating with direct, personal messages from God to the human soul; the Gospels help us to get acquainted with the Redeemer and to understand the kind of life he wants us to live and his hope for the world; the Acts give us clear pictures of men who were impelled by the power of the Holy Ghost and challenge us to let the risen Christ work through us as he worked through them; the other epistles are full of spiritual help, and the book of Revelation gives us visions of the life to come. All are important; all help us to know Christ better; all lead us to God. We must not slight these other books, even while agreeing that Paul is the direct messenger to us Gentiles to show us the way of salvation by faith.

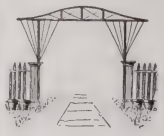
Be noble! and the nobleness which lies in other men, sleeping but never dead, will rise in majesty to meet thine own.

More Handiwork for Boys and Girls



THIS is the time the vines and creepers which you planted early in the season are needing your help and care to make them feel at home and grow luxuriantly. Even old vines want encouragement, a bit of string here, a criss-cross support there, to help them toward making your garden a success.

Much that is both useful and joyous can be done out of doors if you are even half-way handy with carpenter's tools, and if you aren't—well, just get some laths and a saw and a hammer, some nails and a ball of twine, and start right in anyway to help the vines by making some simple garden trellises and supports.

Small trellises are easily put together, and it is great fun to design them. For example: To a central stick about two inches square and six feet long nail short laths in some more or less regular pattern. The finished trellis should measure about three feet across and four feet high. The center stick must be buried at least two feet in the ground. Make up your own designs—squares, oblongs, pyramids are effective—and here is a good opportunity for original work.

A large fan-shaped vine-support in one piece is easily made and satisfactory. Soak a pine board in water over night and slit it, as shown in the illustration. Spread it and fasten the sections apart with short laths and small nails. Use this vine-support to hide any unsightly place in the garden, or to beautify some sunny corner.

A Fan Trellis

The Gateway

THE garden gateway should always be vine-clad. If yours is bare make an arbor over it for vines to trail upon. To the fence posts on either side fasten two uprights about five feet high, nail a scantling across the top, leaving an extension of two feet, as shown in the picture. The strings upon which the vines will climb should be strong whipcord and not wire, which rusts and holds the heat and is never good for young trailers.

There is nothing that will more fully repay your attention just now than the vines. Watch each little tendril as it appears, and see that it has support and help to make it grow.

2,500 Kites in the Air

THE public school boys, especially those in the fifth and sixth grades, which include manual training in the year's work, are very much excited over approaching tournaments, which are to take place simultaneously during the last week of school in several cities in Ohio and Illinois. Prizes will be awarded for the construction of kites, for speed based on the number of feet of string unwound in a given time, and for high flying. In Columbus, twenty-five hundred kites of all shapes and sizes will be in the air together when the tournament is on. The box-kite, the tailless, and the "bow" are the most popular models. The city will in each instance be decked with flags and bunting on tournament day, and all good citizens will cheer and entertain the boys.

Claribel Stearns
Winner of Watch in May Contest

This is the very best kind of a suggestion. Almost any boy could get up a kite-flying contest among his friends. If he got many boys interested the mayor of the town might be persuaded to offer prizes and help plan for a red, white and blue kite tournament as a part of the Independence Day festivities.

An Important Birthday

ON JUNE 14 the Stars and Stripes will proudly wave upon the flagstaffs of all public buildings and will be patriotically displayed from the roofs and windows of business blocks and private houses throughout the country, for it is Old Glory's birthday.

Let every CHRISTIAN HERALD boy and girl set flying the national emblem from home window or the flagstaff on the lawn. It will speak for you its hallowed message:

In God is our trust.
And the star-spangled banner in triumph doth wave,
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

How the Little Kite Learned to Fly

"I never can do it," the little kite said,
As he looked at the others high over his head;
"I know I should fall if I tried to fly."
"Try," said the big kite; "only try,
Or I fear you never will learn at all."
But the little kite said, "I'm afraid
I'll fall."

The big kite nodded: "Ah, well; good-by;
I'm off"; and he rose toward the tranquil sky.
Then the little kite's paper stirred at the sight,
And trembling he shook himself free for flight.
First whirling and frightened, then braver grown,
Up, up he rose through the air alone,
Till the big kite looking down could see
The little one rising steadily.

Then how the little kite thrilled with pride,
As he sailed with the big kite side by side!
While far below he could see the ground,
And the boys like small spots moving round.
They rested high in the quiet air,
And only the birds and clouds were there.
"Oh, how happy I am!" the little kite cried;
"And all because I was brave and tried."

The Flaked Cooking Salt

Note What It Does

This salt is probably new to you, madam. But it's an "old story" now with thousands of housewives; a permanent, modern-day kitchen aid. The reason is this:

Diamond Crystal Cooking Salt Flakes dissolve instantly, and their "pure-salt" flavor distributes evenly, throughout the whole dish. No caking. No bunching. No forming in pockets to make portions over-salty.

Common, hard-grain salt is slow to melt in comparison. One cannot get the good results with it that make this flaked salt so popular. You'll demonstrate that fact to yourself just as soon as you try the flakes.

Phone your grocer now while you think of it.

COMMENTS OF THE PRESS ON TOPICS OF THE DAY

Gold on the Farm

HOW important women are to the farm, and how successful women can be as farmers, is being demonstrated on all sides in these progressive days. Probably no back-to-the-farm movement has had more success than that fostered by the Government Department of Agriculture as canning and poultry clubs in Southern farming districts. The government is glad to help every girl on a farm who wants to earn a little money. The government enters into a vigorous correspondence in order to help overcome difficulties. In the clubs in South Carolina, which are tomato clubs, they made a splendid financial success and are rapidly becoming rivals of the boys' corn clubs.

The women of the country seem to be coming to realize that there is gold buried in the smallest patch of ground.—The Delineator.

A Sane Fourth

NEW YORK'S Fourth of July Committee is jubilant. It declares that but twenty cities had "sane Fourths" in 1909, when 5,307 persons were killed as a result of the celebration. But 2,923 persons were killed and injured in 1910, because ninety-one cities had "sane Fourths," and in 1911, when 161 cities fell in line, the number of dead and maimed was reduced to 1,603. There is a degree of truth, therefore, in the committee's boast that "three years of 'sane Fourths' have saved 6,000 persons from death and injury."—New York Times.

The College Woman

IF I were a man I think I'd fight shy of a college woman. Will she make a good wife? Perhaps—when she'd lived long enough to forget her degree. In the majority of cases, I fear she would make things rather unpleasant—that is, especially if the man did not happen to have had similar or superior advantages. And the secret of marital happiness, of the whole sex problem, for that matter, is the recognition of the equality of the sexes. Equality—of both man and woman; the realization that neither is the superior.—Gertrude Atherton in New York Times.

China's Troubles

THE situation in China does not materially improve. Private letters from Americans in the troubled country report that anarchy prevails in all parts of it. The provinces refuse to recognize the central government, and the provincial leaders persistently act independently of each other. The right of the newly constituted authorities at Peking to provincial matters is hotly disputed. The Manchus are intriguing for a return to power. The central government needs money, and although we read from time to time of new Chinese loans, there seems no likelihood of successful negotiation with European financiers under existing conditions.—New York Times.

The Restoration of Self-Government

THE American has received inquiries from several persons who say they do not understand what is meant by the initiative, the referendum and the recall.

The initiative stands for the power of the people to start the making of a new law that their lawmaking agents have neglected.

The referendum stands for the power of the people to stop the making of a new law that their lawmaking agents have started.

The recall stands for the power of the people to cancel the commission of an agent who has disappointed them.

The initiative supplies an imperative way of bringing public opinion to bear upon a legislature for the starting of a good piece of lawmaking.

The referendum supplies an imperative way of bringing public opinion to bear upon a legislature for the stopping of a bad piece of lawmaking.

The recall is a short and summary substitute for impeachment. It enables the people to get rid of a poor agent without proving that he is a bad man.

An incidental advantage of the recall is that its occasional practice will discourage the growth in this country of the Old World feudal idea that a public office is a piece of private property—a proprietary right or vested interest. No country in which public offices are owned by individuals can remain free. In free countries a public office is a terminable franchise held at the will of the sovereign people.—New York American.

Is There a Roman Peril?

WHEN I was in America nine years ago," says the Rev. R. J. Campbell, pastor of the City Temple, London, "I noticed that Roman Catholicism enjoyed a much greater amount of consideration than it was accustomed to in Great Britain, but in the intervening period it seems to have gained enormously in America, so much so that evidences of its power confront one on every hand. This is a thing that seems to need accounting for."

The evidences of Roman Catholic growth of which Mr. Campbell speaks, and of the apprehension aroused by it, have been emphasized during the past few weeks in many ways, and chiefly in the formation of a society called "The Guardians of Liberty." This new organization is supported by Lieut.-Gen. Nelson A. Miles, Major-Gen. D. E. Sickles, Rear-Admiral G. W. Baird, and former Congressman Charles D. Haines, of New York. . . .

The organization of "The Guardians of Liberty" is clearly one of many efforts now being made in America to ward off what is regarded by some as the Roman Catholic "peril."

While, as a general thing, observes a writer in the Philadelphia Presbyterian, churches are not called on to interfere with each other's affairs, there are questions that affect all Christian bodies. Just now, he continues, the pressure and demands of Roman Catholicism concern all Protestants. He cites a dictum of Archbishop Ireland to the effect that the church can never come into its own until there are more Roman Catholics in Congress. He says: "With President after President distributing offices right and left to the Roman Catholic Church, with an ex-President proclaiming openly that there is no reason why we should not have a Roman Catholic President, with both great political parties working on the same line for votes, we cannot wonder that the Roman body looks to the time when they will control both the secular and religious affairs of the nation." All their organizations, he tries to show, are combining to this end. "In several States they have succeeded in making a new holiday in honor of Columbus. They are now trying to make it (and, it is said, Saint Patrick's Day) national holidays." Of nine judges in the sturdy old Puritan State of Massachusetts, "eight are said to be Romanists."—Current Literature.

What women ask about Crisco

THE discovery of Crisco has awakened a truly remarkable interest. Finding it hard to believe that its many advantages were possible, hundreds of people have written us, asking question after question about it.

Is Crisco healthful?

Crisco, on account of its pure vegetable origin, is more healthful than any animal, or partially animal fat.

Is Crisco economical when used as you would lard?

Crisco goes further, lasts longer than lard. Foods fry in Crisco so quickly, that a crust forms instantly, and prevents absorption. Often after using Crisco for deep frying, when pouring the Crisco back, it looks as if it will overflow the can, so little has been absorbed. Crisco does not absorb either odors or flavors, does not discolor or burn. Strain Crisco through cheese cloth and it can be used and re-used, two or three times as often as lard.

Why is it that Crisco fried foods are not greasy?

As Crisco stands a much higher temperature than does butter or lard, foods fry in it more quickly. A crust forms instantly, which is the secret of the crispness and flakiness of foods fried in Crisco. Letters have been received from over a hundred women in one month commenting on the improvement Crisco has made in their doughnuts or crullers.

Has Crisco a disagreeable odor?

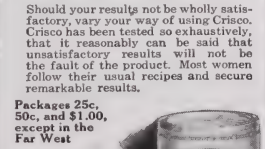
One of the most pleasing features of Crisco is its delicate aroma. Crisco biscuits or Crisco short-cake, served hot, will be most convincing proof.

The best way to use Crisco.

Do not keep Crisco in the refrigerator. Like butter, it hardens quickly with cold, but works perfectly at the usual room temperature. For cake, use a little less than you would of butter; for pastry, one-fifth less than lard. When used instead of butter, add salt. In making pastry cut Crisco into the flour with a knife; use as little water as possible and handle lightly.

Should your results not be wholly satisfactory, vary your way of using Crisco. Crisco has been tested so exhaustively, that it reasonably can be said that unsatisfactory results will not be the fault of the product. Most women follow their usual recipes and secure remarkable results.

Packages 25c, 50c, and $1.00, except in the Far West



On request, we will mail an illustrated book of Tested Crisco Recipes. These show you the best ways of using Crisco in your everyday cooking, and explain many other advantages of Crisco. Write for a copy.

THE STOCKHOLDER

THERE are two divisions into which the securities offered to the public by corporations divide themselves. These are shares of stock and mortgage bonds. In a previous article the main features of corporate bonds were pointed out. It will be the object of this article to explain generally the method by which shares of stock are issued and the rights of stockholders.

A corporation, which has been defined as an artificial body created by the State and whose duration is generally perpetual, has its inception in the organization of three or more individuals under a corporate name, who apply to the State for a charter. It formerly required a special act of the legislature to grant a charter, but as abuses grew up under that system owing to favoritism in thus granting charters, the States now have general corporation laws under which any persons complying with the law can file a certificate of incorporation and become a corporation. This certificate of incorporation is a legal document signed by the three incorporators, giving the name chosen for the new company, the amount of capital stock to be authorized, the number of directors, and generally the names of the directors chosen for the first year, and setting forth in detail the business which the corporation proposes to carry on. With the filing of this certificate with the State official designated and the payment of the fee for doing business as a corporation the company is born, and thenceforth its management is in the hands of the stockholders. It should be noted, however, that corporations organized to engage in public service, such as railroads, telephone and telegraph, gas and electric lighting, banking, etc., are provided for by special laws. Greater strictness is exercised in allowing such corporations to come into existence, for, obviously, they have a greater public duty and are freer from competition than the ordinary commercial or manufacturing company. Over them the State also exercises a greater supervision.

Forming the Company

Let us suppose now that the name of the company has been adopted and the certificate of incorporation filed and that the company is to begin business with a minimum cash capital of $500 and that the par value of shares is to be $100. Two of the incorporators then receive one share each and the third, three shares of stock. The incorporators meet and adopt by-laws, which set out the duties and salaries of the officers in detail. A corporate seal is adopted by which the formal acts of the corporation are evidenced and the meetings of the directors are provided for. All these preliminary matters are decided by the three stockholders, and as each share of stock has one vote it is apparent that the control of the company is in the hands of the stockholders owning a majority of the stock. The directors too are elected by the stockholders at annual meetings and they in turn elect the officers of the company. The majority stockholders then control the policy of the company and manage its business through the board of directors. The minority stockholder, however, is not helpless, as the law gives him the right to compel the directors and officers to carry on the company's business in such a way as to result in the greatest good to all the stockholders.

Rights of Stockholders

We have started with but five shares of stock issued and paid for, but now the directors provide for the issue of more, either in exchange for cash or business or property. Each person thus acquiring stock may have his name entered on the books of the company as a stockholder and must be given notice and an opportunity to appear at stockholders' meetings. He can delegate his right to vote on his stock by giving a proxy to some other person. He also has the right to examine the stock book of the company to ascertain the names of other stockholders and co-operate with them. Heavy penalties are provided for a refusal to allow a stockholder to examine the stock book of the company. If the business of the company is successful and there is a net profit, it is the duty of the directors to divide this among the stockholders in proportion to their holdings, by way of dividends. Minority stockholders can, in proper cases, compel the directors to declare a dividend. On the other hand, if the directors declare and pay a dividend where there are no net profits they are answerable personally to any creditor of the company to the full amount of such dividend. It must be remembered that stockholders are the proprietors of the company. They are not creditors. Their claims are only to a proportionate share of the company's property after all creditors are paid. They are members of a vast partnership.

Preferred Stock

Thus far we have only considered "common" stock. Often there is also issued "preferred" stock. The holders of the latter have the first right to the surplus profits or dividends. If, for instance, the stock is five per cent. preferred, a dividend of five per cent. must be paid to all the holders of this stock before any dividend goes to the common stockholders. If the stock is "cumulative" preferred stock, all dividends back to the time of its issue must be paid to date before any dividend is paid on the common stock. On dissolution, too, the preferred stockholders receive back the par value of their stock next after bondholders and general creditors and before the common stockholders receive anything. But the company may prove so successful that the dividends on the common stock may exceed those on the preferred, for the preferred is limited to its prescribed rate of dividends, and there is no limit to the rate on common stock. Often, too, no voting rights are given to the preferred stock, so that its holder has no voice in the affairs of the company.

The directors decide for what property and at what value the stock of the company shall be issued. If property is taken in exchange for stock at too high a value, the stock is said to be "watered." This is one of the commonest and gravest abuses in corporate management. It is a hopeful sign that the States are every year holding directors to stricter personal responsibility in this respect, the State of Kansas being probably the leader in vigilance under the wise administration of Governor Stubbs. The time is not far distant when the purchasers of stock may rest assured that each dollar's worth of stock issued by his company represents a dollar's full value, either in cash or property.

Stocks Versus Bonds

In the meantime, however, the prospective investor should not forget the fundamental difference between a share of stock and a bond. As has been suggested above, the owner of a share of stock is a partner in the general enterprise. If the company issuing the stock is able to declare a dividend, the stockholder will benefit to that extent. If the business of the company is not profitable, and the company is unable to declare a dividend, the stockholder can expect to receive no profit himself.

The bondholder, on the other hand, is not a partner in the concern issuing the bond. By virtue of the conditions under which bonds are usually issued, the owner of the bond is a creditor to whom the company is indebted and the indebtedness must be liquidated before any profit can accrue to the mere stock owner; so that for the inexperienced investor the bond will generally be found to be the safer form of security.

Railway Equipment Obligations

Railway Equipment Obligations because of their fundamental soundness have become a very popular form of investment security. They combine in a high degree the three requisites of a good investment—security, marketability, and liberal income.

We have prepared a booklet describing the more important issues of the principal railroads, and will be pleased to mail a copy to you upon request.

more conquests, in a chariot of fire. Let us recall how God cured Elijah of his doubts. In a panorama of earthquake and fire he showed his power, and then came a quieter but mightier force—a "voice." For convincing men of God and right, Elijah was taught that the Word of God and the human "voice" speaking for God are more successful than any display of force.

In a similar way, Jesus dealt with the doubts of John. John's disciples came to Jesus with the message, "Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?" Probably John the Baptist shared the Messianic expectations of his time, and supposed Jesus, as the Messiah, would, by a display of military or miraculous force, conquer the Romans and liberate his people. But he did not even use his miraculous power to defend his forerunner, imprisoned by Hero for preaching the truth. Hope deferred had made the stout heart of the prophet prisoner sick. Perhaps he thought he might hasten the expected demonstration of Messianic power by such a deputation as he was sending. Like Elijah he was relying too much on such spectacular triumphs as that of Carmel. And like Elijah, he learned "the might of gentleness." John's disciples saw the sick healed, the demoniac calmed, the children blessed, the poor instructed, the dead raised.

"These," said Jesus, in substance, "are the real evidences of Christianity. Christianity shall prove its claims in the world not by wars of conquest but by its fruits of neighborliness; the disposition it puts in its followers, even the children, to help others, to do somebody a good turn every day; the kindlier social life it shall develop in families, in schools, even in commercial and political associations, in cities and nations."

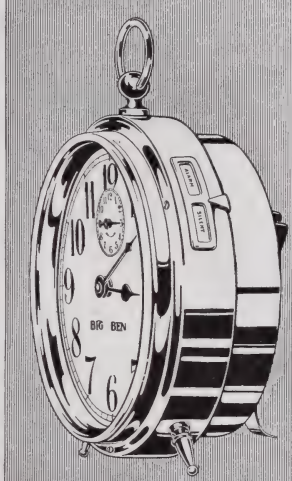
Some of the students now being educated in this school are supported by kind-hearted friends in America.

—THE STEAMSHIP Carmania when she sailed recently carried 1,000 volumes of Scripture, donated by the New York Bible Society. These volumes were taken on board by a worker who distributes for the society. The New York Bible Society is one of the great benevolent enterprises of the city, and its work is done so unostentatiously that it often escapes public notice. It is the only society having for its sole work Bible distribution in the city and harbor of New York.

—A JUNIOR CHORUS of 500 boys and girls from ten to fifteen years of age was one of the features of the afternoon meetings of the campaign, conducted by Evangelist T. L. Hutchison, under the auspices of the Men and Religion Forward Movement, at Weatherford, Tex. The children's singing helped to bring their parents into touch with the meetings. The chorus was under the direction of Horace F. Erwin, who also organized, for the same campaign, an adult chorus of 260 voices.

—DR. H. C. LYMAN, who has been in charge of the divinity department at Benedict College, Columbia, S. C., has recently been elected superintendent of the department of work for negroes. Dr. Lyman while teaching in Columbia had charge of the college Sunday school and made the work there markedly successful in enlisting the students as teachers. He trained them to teach and then gave them practice work under his own supervision. Opportunity to do every detail of the management of the school from the making of the program to the teaching of the teachers showed them the method and gave them confidence to undertake the work itself. For three years these students have actually been using this new method of Sunday school work in their home churches during vacation and after graduation, which proves the plan practicable. Dr. Lyman is now at work in the six colleges and the Sunday schools (over eighty) in Atlanta, Ga.

Big Ben



Big Ben, the national sleep-meter, is arousing thousands to enthusiastic punctuality. Everywhere, everyday the gentle, insistent voice of Big Ben taps the "sleepy head" to joyous action. In city flat and country home this "minute-man" starts the day with a smile. Big Ben never fails—he's dependable. He rings 5 minutes straight, or at intervals of 30 seconds for 10 minutes. He tells the truth and gets you up "on the dot."

Big Ben is hand-built, like a fine, thin-model watch, and "chronometer-checked" for 140 hours for accuracy. Eagle-eyed inspectors watch every process from start to finish. Nine hundred skilled watch-makers build Big Ben—the clock that's the pride of the famous Westclox Community of La Salle, Illinois.

The First Big Ben Cost $12.85

Big Ben is the result of 26 years of fine clock making. The first Big Ben cost $12.85 to make. The first hundred cost $6.50 each. But the tremendous demand has brought the price down to everyone's pocketbook—$2.50. An artist worked three months on the dial alone, but the pleasing clock countenance he produced was worth it.

2,500 Big Bens now leave the Westclox Community every 10 hours and the demand gets bigger daily. Big Ben has ticked himself into popular favor because he is built right, runs right and is priced right.

Sunday School Lesson

There is nothing of which the saying is truer than of religions: "By their fruits ye shall know them." Now that the world is all one neighborhood, and in the universities of every land young men of all faiths and of all unbeliefs are brought together, there are many honest doubters asking: Is Christianity the one true religion? or is Mohammedanism or Buddhism or Hinduism better? or is a combination of all best of all? or shall we more reasonably adopt agnosticism's denial of the provability of all?

These are not mere academic questions, but rather questions of life and death in many souls, not only in mission lands, but here. There are temples of many pagan faiths in our cities, and not a few Americans are propagating Oriental cults to which they are apparently drawn by a passion for novelty and mystery. Let this lesson be used in and out of college for bringing to such doubters Christ's proof of Christianity, its fruits.

Sir William Thomson (Lord Kelvin), physicist, mathematician, engineer, inventor, president of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and honorary member of the Russian Academy of Sciences, was one day accosted by a pompous scientist who asked the question: "What do you consider the greatest discovery you ever made?" Reverently lifting his hat, Lord Kelvin replied: "The greatest discovery I ever made was when I discovered my Saviour in Jesus Christ."

When the representatives of Oriental faiths came to the Parliament of Religions at the Columbian Fair of 1893 and set the most beautiful sayings of their sacred books—a few gems plucked out of much mire—in contrast with the most inconsistent social conduct of so-called Christian nations, there were some shallow Americans who sighed, "Dear Buddha and poor Jesus!" But the single question, "How do you treat women?" if only some one had dared to ask it, would have exposed, like a flashlight, the failure of Hinduism, Buddhism, Zoroastrianism, Shintoism, Confucianism, Mohammedanism, by the test of fruitage. The historical answer to that question shows conclusively the failure of all pagan faiths, ancient and modern, to produce the two chief elements of social welfare, good morals and human rights. Not one pagan faith has given woman her civil rights, nor has any one of them produced a wholesome family life.

Christianity is very imperfectly expressed as yet in the business and politics and pleasures of so-called Christian nations, but its social influence even in these fields, which are least leavened by it as yet, challenges comparison with the fruits of infidelity in France, as it challenges comparison in those fields with Oriental religions. In the words of Wendell Phillips: "The answer to Confucianism is China; the answer to Buddhism is India; the answer to Mohammedanism is Turkey. The answer of the Bible is the Christian civilization of Europe and America." That this is the best civilization is conceded by Japan in its deliberate adoption, years ago, of the main features of Christian civilization.

Your Life as a Cure of Doubt

Besides these big wholesale arguments for faith in Christianity because it makes better homes and better governments than any other religion, let us put before the doubters whom we meet the retail argument of Christlike, unselfish lives, not too engrossed in self but sincerely interested in "the other fellow"; in his physical and spiritual welfare and happiness.

KODAK FILM

Will tell the story of your vacation. There's film for a dozen pictures in each cartridge, the weight is trifling.

The Kodak itself slips into the pocket and the picture making is simple from start to finish. Press the button—do the rest—or leave it to another—just as you please.

The Kodak system does more than simply remove the inconveniences of the glass plate and dark-room methods of picture taking—it gives better results. There's no question about the advantages of daylight loading and daylight development by the Tank method. Thousands of the best professional photographers now use the Tank system for their work even though they have the experience and the facilities for dark-room work. They have adopted the Tank because it gives them better results. If it's better for the professional there's no question about it for the amateur.

You can take good pictures with a Kodak. You can finish them well by the Kodak system without a dark-room—or if you prefer, can mail them at slight cost and no danger of breakage if you wish to have a professional finisher do the work for you.

Ask your dealer or write us for Kodak catalogue.

Kodaks, from $5.00 up. Brownie Cameras (they work like Kodaks), from $1.00 to $12.00.

Since the Slugger, Coffee, Was Abandoned

Coffee probably causes more biliousness and so-called malaria than any one other thing—even bad climate. (Tea is just as harmful as coffee because it contains caffeine the drug in coffee.)

A Ft. Worth man says:

"I have always been of a bilious temperament, subject to malaria and up to one year ago a perfect slave to coffee. At times I would be covered with boils and full of malarial poison, was very nervous and had swimming in the head.

"I don't know how it happened, but I finally became convinced that my sickness was due to the use of coffee, and a little less than a year ago I stopped coffee and began drinking Postum.

"From that time I have not had a boil, not had malaria at all, have gained 15 pounds good solid weight and know beyond all doubt this is due to the use of Postum in place of coffee as I have taken no medicine at all.

"Postum has certainly made healthy, red blood for me in place of the blood that coffee drinking impoverished and made unhealthy." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek Mich.

Postum makes red blood.

"There 's a reason," and it is explained in the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

What My Pupils say:

"Every one notices the change in my complexion—it has lost that yellow color."

"Just think what you have done to me! Last year I weighed 216 pounds, this year 146, and have not gained an ounce back. I am not weak-kneed either. I feel so young and strong, no rheumatism, or sluggish liver, and I can breathe now. It is surprising how easily I did it. I feel 15 years younger."

"Just think! I have not had a pill or a cathartic since I began, and I used to take one every night."

"My weight has increased 19 pounds. I don't know what indigestion is any more, and my nerves are so rested! I sleep like a baby."

"Miss Cocroft, I have left-off eyeglasses, and my eyesight is so much better, isn't that good?"

"I feel as if I could look every man, woman and child in the face with the feeling that I am aware of spiritually, physically and mentally. Really I am a stronger, better woman. I don't know how to tell you or to thank you."

Reports like these come to me every day. Do you wonder I want to help every woman to vibrant health and happiness? Write me your faults of health or figure. Your correspondence is held in strict confidence. If I cannot help you I will tell you what will.

My free book tells how to stand and walk correctly, and contains other information of vital interest to women. Every woman is welcome to it. Write for it. If you do not need me, you may be able to help a dear friend.

I have had a wonderful experience, and I'd like to tell you about it.

Sunday School Lesson

through the woods in the early morning and have noted how quiet everything seems to be. But rap hard on the trunk of a tree and immediately swarms of little insects appear; from hidden places they come out to see what has happened. Before that they had been busy with their own little tasks. In the world of humanity each individual seems to be engrossed in his own affairs. What is needed is a rap to startle them out of their selfishness. Are you not the one to give it: a loving word, a kind deed, the story of Christ told with a new energy and new determination!

"There hath not arisen a greater." The climax of this story is the talk of Jesus on greatness, suggested by the message from John. That he had shown a human fault seems clear from Jesus' words, "Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me." But in spite of his honest doubt—and this is a great fact for honest doubters—Jesus still held him as before in highest esteem as the greatest of the prophets who had heralded his coming. In dress John was the veriest country boor, clad with the skins and woven hair of beasts. And his food was locusts and wild honey. His home had been the caves of the wilderness. In all this he reminds the poorest of us that greatness does not depend on "soft raiment" and "kings' houses." Sons of the wilderness, like Elijah and John the Baptist, may be in any age the true prophets of God and heralds of Christ. After all it is not knowledge that makes men great so much as will, a will quick to choose the right and persistent in holding to it; aggressive also in conquering wrong.

Dr. Farrar, in his book of sermons for children, quotes a beautiful incident. He says: "In the field of myth and fable we find pleasure in searching for the first rose bush. One of the beautiful stories is that Queen Elizabeth of Hungary loved the poor and went from house to house with food, medicine and sunshine. Her husband was cruel and forbade his wife doing any act of charity. He threatened to cut off her head if she disobeyed. Hearing of a very poor family with no food, and the children sick, she started out with food and medicine, and met her husband face to face on the street. 'What have you under your cloak?' he asked. She was too frightened to speak, but whispered to God for help. Her husband in anger tore open her cloak and stood amazed. It was a bitter cold day, but there in the queen's arms was a great sheaf of beautiful red and white roses. She gave the king a rose, and at its touch he lost his anger and smiled. Each day she gave him one of the roses, and he became good-natured and friendly to the poor. From house to house the king and queen went after that, and wherever they left a rose it turned into food and medicine according to the need. . . . Let us turn from the field of fable to the garden of fact. Solomon represented Christ as saying: 'I am the rose of Sharon.' When Christ was upon earth, he said: 'I am the Vine, ye are the branches.' If, then, we are one with Christ as a branch is one with the vine, there will be roses not only on our cheeks, but they will drop from our hands in our every act of love and kindness."

SOME SMALL, SWEET WAY

There's never a rose in all the world
But makes some green spray sweeter;
There's never a wind in all the sky
But makes some bird wing fleeter;
There's never a star but brings to heaven
Some silver radiance tender;
And never a rosy cloud but helps
To crown the sunset splendor;
No robin but may thrill some heart,
His dawn-like gladness voicing;
God gives us all some small, sweet way
To set the world rejoicing.

10,000 Cars at $1,055

To Introduce Reo the Fifth

By R. E. Olds, Designer

To the Thousands Who are Buying

I am not writing this to sell more cars. The present demand taxes our utmost capacity. And the cars in use will sell our future output better than words of mine.

In all my experience of 25 years I have never seen a success like that of Reo the Fifth. I have never seen a car so popular.

What I have to say now is to you who are buying, largely through faith in me.

I want you to know that, despite this rush, there are hundreds of us watching every car. We are giving more than we promised.

And you who took my word—who are buying first—are getting an underprice.

Just the Start

Reo the Fifth is not built for a season. The present demand is just the beginning.

This car, remember, is the final result of 25 years spent in car building. It marks my limit—the very best I can do. And no car of the future can greatly improve on it.

The cars we sell now are sent out to sell others—to create reputation for My Farewell Car. And you may be sure that not a car goes out until we know it is utterly perfect.

Our Costly Care

We analyze the steel that goes into this car. Every part is inspected over and over. Every part with a flaw is rejected.

Every important part is put to radical test before it goes into the car.

The engines are tested for 48 hours. The finished cars are given more severe try-outs than in any other factory I know.

Parts are ground over and over to get utter exactness. Absolute silence in every part is demanded.

Each body is finished in 17 coats. The upholstering is perfect. To every part we give the final touch, regardless of time or cost.

For each of these cars is a salesman. Each will tell to hundreds of people the story of Reo the Fifth. And all our success in the future depends on the tale they tell.

The Underprice

There was never a car so underpriced as Reo the Fifth at $1,055. Every man knows this who makes any comparison.

This price is ridiculous. It is too low to endure. The coming advance in the cost of materials is bound to send it soaring.

But we are content to sell 10,000 cars without regard to profit. So the present price will doubtless continue during the spring demand.

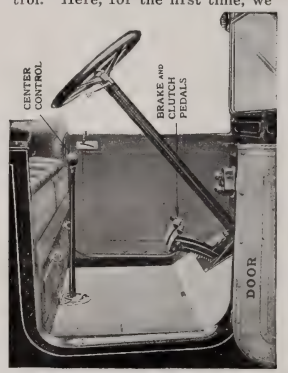
It goes to original buyers—to the men who first come to this car. And they will create our future market. Their cars will be our future advertisements.

You early buyers are getting an inside price, and I am glad to know it. But men who expect the present price to continue are bound to be disappointed.

The Center Control

This Year's Best Innovation

The success of Reo the Fifth is largely due to our new center control. Here, for the first time, we get rid of all side levers. Both doors in front are clear.



All the gear shifting is done by moving this center lever less than three inches, in each of four directions. It is done with the right hand.

Both brakes are operated by foot pedals, one of which also operates the clutch.

This arrangement permits of the left side drive, heretofore possible in electric cars only. The driver sits, as he should sit, close to the cars he passes and on the up side of the road.

The old side drive will appear very awkward when you once see this.

1,000 Dealers

Reo the Fifth is sold by dealers in a thousand towns, so everyone can easily see it.

Our catalog shows the various bodies and gives every detail. Ask us to mail it to you. Address

CUBA'S BLACK REBELLION

Miss Marina Gomez

CUBA has been called upon to decide the most momentous question that could present itself in the history of her development. "Shall Cuba be a white republic or a black republic?" Now, as this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in preparation, that question is being answered amidst the rapid movements of troops and the cracking of rifles, while just across at Key West the United States holds troops and ships ready to rush to the aid of the foreign population and property holders should Cuba's army prove unequal to its task of protection.

The problem of race and color is an aggravated one in Cuba. he Cuban negro or half-caste has the best of claims to full litical and social equality. He can back his demands with e assertion that for this he bore arms against Spain, and is true that from the colored population of the island came th officers and privates who proved themselves good fighters—men of courage, energy and devotion. During those ars of fighting there was practically no color line; but with dependence an accomplished fact the natural change slowly arted and the two races have drawn gradually apart. lowly lines of distinction have been established, which, ough they are still more lax than apply in most countries mixed population, have irked the negroes and stood in the ay of their pet ambitions. The chief of these ambitions is hold a proportionate share, according to population, of the ation's public offices, from the highest to the lowest. This ambition has never en fully gratified, partly because of racial reasons and partly because the ublic offices have been the subject of a long and hotly contested political rangle amongst the whites themselves. Most of Cuba's internal troubles ave arisen from this question of patronage. An organization known as the eterans advances prior claims to all offices on the basis of military service.

President José Miguel Gomez

The present administration headed by President José Miguel Gomez has never recognized these claims and political feeling was at white heat when the rise of a common foe united all shades of political opinion for the defense of the status of the white race in the island.

The recent enactments of the Cuban Congress on the subject of the organization of political parties on racial lines is given as the basis of the present trouble, but as the revolt has proved to be largely confined to the eastern provinces, where many of the negroes are from Haiti and where as much French is spoken among them as Spanish, it is a natural conclusion that neither civil rights nor political party is so much the cause of the insurrection as an unreasoning desire for power at any cost. The more prosperous and better educated negro and half-caste elements of western Cuba have so far taken no stand with the insurrectos. In fact one of the most influential of the veteran negro officers has offered his services to the Gomez government.

Miss Narcisa Gomez

Although the political feeling in the island has run so high and some of the accusations have been as bitter as political accusations are usually made, from the unbiased outside viewpoint the administration of President Gomez has been a good one. Although the president has the military title of general, he is not so much of a soldier or a great statesman as he is a good business man. During this time, when Cuba has needed more business ability and less statecraft than she may need again, President Gomez has brought to his position a keen knowledge of the agricultural conditions of the island, its needs, and its possibilities. It has been announced many times as General Gomez's intention to accept only one term as president, thus establishing a precedent for a Latin-American republic.

CUBA'S BLACK REBELLION

Many have believed that this determination was very largely due to his desire to get his hands once more actively upon the control of his large plantations. His good business administration of the affairs of the little republic is shown by the increasing figures of the exports and imports, the growing stability and prosperity of agriculture, the construction of new railroads and bridges and the substitution of new and modern buildings for many of the antiquated Spanish structures which have been doing duty as public offices. The problems of education have not escaped him and the improvement in Cuba's school system and the introduction of training courses for teachers show the steps that have been made toward modernizing an educational system which only fourteen years ago was one of the most benighted and antiquated on earth.

The president's family life is rather typical of the man himself. He cares little or nothing for show, and after having spent the hours from nine to eleven and from two to four in his routine work he drives or motors through the streets of Havana and the surrounding country without any greater guard than his wife and some of his daughters or one of his secretaries. The ladies of the president's family play a large part in the social life of Havana. There are four daughters, two of whom are married, and one son in the family. It was only last fall that all four of these young ladies were in Philadelphia for the launching of the two ships of Cuba's navy that are doing such splendid service just now. On October 9 Miss Narcisa Gomez and her sister, Miss Marina, the president's unmarried daughters, named the vessels La Patria and Cuba. On their trip to America they were accompanied by Señor de Morales Coello, Secretary of the Cuban Navy, and his wife, who is one of the president's married daughters, and Dr. de Mencia and his wife, the fourth daughter.

Señora Gomez, the president's wife, has achieved for herself an enviable place in the hearts of the Cuban people by her activity in charitable work of all kinds. Her name is identified with a large number of the organizations for the aid of the poor and unfortunate of the island. There is a pretty little story told of her which dates back to the time of the Cuban Revolution, when General (now President) Gomez was in the field. It seems that during that time Señora Gomez formed a friendship for the wife of a Spanish colonel, who was also in the field, but fighting on the opposite side. A short time ago Señora Gomez learned that the Spanish lady, now a widow, was in reduced circumstances. The president's wife remembered her old friend even though revolution, with its bitterness of feeling, defeat and victory, had come between them; and she not only sent a goodly sum of money, but made an arrangement whereby it was possible for the Spanish lady to relieve herself of all want.

The era of peace that has been coincident with President Gomez's administration was rudely interrupted by the insurrection of the lower-class negroes. The first reports of the trouble to reach the United States were wildly exaggerated and gave the impression that the situation had within the first twelve hours passed beyond the control of the government. As fuller details became known it was realized that the upper-class negroes and half-castes of Cuba joined their fellow citizens of Spanish descent in regarding the insurrectos as "seditious enemies of their country."

For some days there had been reports of difficulty with the negroes in Oriente Province, but it was not until May 21 that the uprising was considered of sufficient importance to be termed war rather than mere civil disorder. It was then learned that Generals Estenoz and Ivonet were in the field at the head of growing bands of negroes. The Cuban government moved with splendid alacrity to the suppression of the revolt, and within a few hours its increasingly efficient little army was in motion attempt to get an action with the rebels, who, though well armed and well mounted, confined their operations to the robbing of plantations and petty depredations, allowing no opening for a real engagement. On May 22 the government conceded that several hundred negroes were out in Santiago, and the governor of Oriente Province wired his estimate that two thousand seven hundred had taken up arms there. Slight engagements were reported from a number of districts that day and such depredations as the raiding of railroad stations and cutting of telegraph wires were not infrequent. In Washington a great deal of anxiety was felt, as the exact state of affairs was not known, and American interests in Cuba are represented by millions of dollars' worth of property and thousands of American citizens.

The most encouraging news of the day was a statement made by the leader of the conservative party in the Cuban Congress, who declared that for the time being the opposition party had ceased to exist and that the government might count on the fullest support from those who only a few days before were its bitterest enemies. The Cuban Government opened recruiting stations for a few days and rushed all available troops to the disaffected districts.

The news of the 23d told only of the vain searc of the Rurales for General Estenoz and his force From the outlying sections came the reports th canefields had been burned and sugar-grindir mills had been compelled to suspend operation That day the United States Navy Department toc its first action and ordered the naval tran port Prairie to embark five hundred marin at Philadelphia and proceed immediately t the United States naval station at Guant namo to join the gunboats Paducah an Nashville. Two hundred additional marin were ordered from New York to Philade phia and the Prairie sailed for Cuba wit seven hundred aboard.

Throughout the day of the 24th the re ports of engagements with small bodies c negroes caused considerable alarm, and rt mors of conspiracy in Havana itself adde to the portentousness of the situation. Re ports received directly from government sources left no doubt that the trouble ha assumed disquieting though not necessaril alarming proportions.

By the morning of the 25th the state o affairs in Cuba appeared so serious that th Navy Department ordered the mobilizatio of two regiments of marines and five battle ships of the Atlantic fleet at Key West, Fla to await the development of events an to be within five hours of the scene of the dis turbance if intervention should become necessary The speed with which the battleships, under th command of Rear-Admiral Osterhaus, were coaled provisioned and made ready with extra companie of marines was a credit to the American naval ser vice. The fleet consists of the flagship Washing ton, the Minnesota, the Ohio, the Missouri, th Mississippi, and the Delaware.

The announcement of the sailing of this America fleet was the immediate cause of anxiety in Havana President Gomez cabled President Taft that thi action had alarmed the Cuban people and seemed t them entirely unjustifiable under the existing cir cumstances, as he believed the Cuban army fully equal to the task of restoring peace in the district where the rebels were operating. This action o Cuba's president was greeted with the greatest ac claim by the entire press of the island. Both gov ernment and opposition organs were loud in thei praises of what they termed the high patriotism and energy of their executive. To strengthen the impression of unity and determination to put down the revolt at the expense of all political feeling the Veterans, who have been the leaders of the opposition party, volunteered their aid if it became necessary.

President Taft hastened to reassure the Cuban people through their president that no intervention was contemplated. In his cablegram he said:

> . . . This government's motive in sending ships to Key West, just as sending the Prairie to the Guantanamo naval station, was merely to be able to act promptly in case it should unfortunately become necessary to protect American life and property by rendering naval support or assistance to the Cuban Government. As was made quite clear at the time, these ordinary measures of protection were entirely dissociated from any question of intervention.

This message served its purpose admirably and received the cordial approval of the Cuban House of Representatives as well as a cablegram of thanks from President Gomez.

The further despatches from Cuba have entirely discountenanced the early statements that the revolt was of such a serious nature that the government would have difficulty in restoring peace. Some Americans, who have returned from the island since the trouble in the eastern provinces started, ridicule the idea of any serious results from the negro revolt, though they admit that it will undoubtedly take some time for the Rurales to search out the negroes in their mountain hiding-places and bring an end to the guerrilla warfare which they may attempt to continue, and which may entail the destruction of some property, though it most assuredly in no way threatens the stability of Cuba's government.

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—WILBUR WRIGHT, pioneer aviator, died of typhoid fever at his home in Dayton, O., on May 30. He is the first prominent aviator to die from natural causes in the ten years of practical flying. One hundred and forty have met death in aviation accidents. A complete sketch of Mr. Wright's life and work will appear in the next number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

—THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES on May 13, by a vote of 237 to 39, passed the Senate resolution providing for the direct election of United States Senators by the people. The plan will now be laid before the various State legislatures for ratification. It will also have to be ratified by the people, and the constitution will need to be amended to make the new system operative.

—THE NEW BISHOPS of the Methodist Episcopal Church, elected at the General Conference held during the month of May at Minneapolis, are Rev. Homer C. Stuntz, D.D.; Rev. Theodore S. Henderson, D.D., Rev. William O. Shepard, D.D., Rev. Naphtali Luccock, D.D., Rev. Francis J. McConnell, D.D., Rev. Frederick D. Leete, D.D., Rev. Richard J. Cooke, D.D., Rev. Wilbur P. Thirkield, D.D. Dr. George P. Eckman, of New York, was appointed editor of the Christian Advocate, Dr. Dan B. Brummitt, of Chicago, editor of the Epworth Herald.

—THE PRESIDENTIAL PREFERENTIAL PRIMARIES in New Jersey on May 28 added another to the series of surprises which Colonel Roosevelt has been regularly handing out to his rival. About 60 per cent. of the normal vote of the State was polled. On the Republican side, Roosevelt captured the delegates-at-large to the National Convention and all of the district delegates as well. Governor Woodrow Wilson carried his own State in the Democratic primaries by a good majority, which was especially marked in the rural districts, and he will have eighteen or nineteen of the district delegates and the four delegates-at-large. President Taft's poor showing, following his loss of other important States, makes the outlook at Chicago extremely doubtful. He entered the New Jersey fight with a confidence that seems to have greatly undervalued the Roosevelt strength, which was demonstrated in the resistless sweep that carried everything before it.

—THE Japan Advertiser of Tokyo is authority for the statement that the proposed "new religion for that country is to be in the nature of a rapprochement between Shintoism, Buddhism and Christianity," and that it will include among other things the introduction of religious teaching in the public schools. For many centuries Shintoism and Buddhism have existed in Japan as distinct religions, and the project for combining them with Christianity cannot be regarded as promising success. The fact that such a plan is seriously discussed is equivalent to a confession of the failure of the two native religions to satisfy the nation's spiritual needs. It is practically suggesting that Christianity be taken on trial with the end in view of making an amalgam of all three; but as there are many points of direct antagonism, such a union is logically impossible.

LOUISIANA'S GREAT DISASTER

NO AMERICAN CATASTROPHE SINCE THE SAN FRANCISCO EARTHQUAKE HAS PRODUCED SUCH TERRIBLE CONDITIONS, SUCH SUFFERING AND SUCH DIRE NEED

A SECTION OF VANDALIA, LA.

A FLOODED RAILWAY EMBANKMENT

BACKWATER from the great levee at Torras, La., has continued to creep over the remaining dry portions of the inundated parishes. From many of the great plantations that had been considered safe have come reports that hundreds of acres of cane and corn are now being destroyed. A despatch from Napoleonville stated recently that hundreds of cane growers in that section will not be able to save enough even to have seed for another year. Almost up until the first of June furniture and live stock were being rushed daily from the interior of the parishes.

No new breaks have been reported in the levees, though in spite of the heroic efforts of the government's engineers and the local authorities, the crevasses at Salem, Alto and Hymelia have continued to widen. The district flooded by the Alto crevasse has been getting more and more water as the breaks in the levees have expanded. The Alto break is now over a mile wide.
